"We want to let the community become stronger," she said. Under the new decision, five of 11 sororities on campus will stretch their number of members to 140, and some sororities already exceed the 140-member quota.

Sorority members said they are eager to embrace the change brought by added members.

Jana Broadbent, president of Kappa Delta said the increase in members will be beneficial to sororities and new recruits.

"The greek experience will be open to more K-State women, and the chapters will become much more even," Broadbent, junior in nutritional sciences said.

While excited about the future, some Kappa Delta members said they also have concerns, especially in terms of personal finance.

Gina Raymonde, freshman in elementary education, said she enjoys the social aspect of being in a sorority, but didn't understand why she has to pay the same fees as other members since she didn't live in the sorority house her freshman year.

"I love being in the house, but it gets expensive sometimes," she said.

According to the fact sheet handed out by the Panhellenic Council, sorority membership fees range from $1,356 to $3,186.

Internet Reliability

Information Web sites can be misleading; students must be careful when researching

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Internet resources can offer a wealth of information and access, but some Web sites could be cause for question.

Bryce Miller, freshman in pre-professional construction science and management, said if he needs something for class or wants to get some useful information, his first stop is usually the free electronic encyclopedia, Wikipedia.

"I use Wikipedia all the time," Miller said. "If I need something for a class, I'd probably go there first."

Miller said he thought the Web site was effective without a large number of flaws.

"It's really easy to look things up, and it's free," Miller said. "It seems to be more accurate, too, with fewer errors per page."

Rebecca Gould, director of the Information Technology Assistance Center, said many people now rely on the Internet as their main source of information.

"I would say it has escalated as a definitive source," Gould said.

"Is it a credible source — that's what students really need to think through," he said.

When surfing Web pages,

Gould said she has noticed some resources created in 2000 and 2001 are already outdated.

"I think students need to be more discerning," Gould said. "I want students to know the difference between online journal articles and almost an online magazine article."

Sara Kearns, instruction coordinator, said the Internet can provide answers to a wide range of questions with general Web sites like Wikipedia, but these should be used with caution.

"There is a lot of talk in the library world about Wikipedia because people can get on and update," Kearns said. "It's a great resource, but the validity can be called into question."

Because Wikipedia can be updated and edited by anyone, Kearns said the resource's reliability is still undecided among many researchers and librarians.

"It's literally a living document," she said. "You just don't know who the people are and the knowledge they have."

For other Internet resources, Kearns said many people turn to online Web logs or blogs for general issues or events on which they can leave comments.

The Librarian's Internet Index Web site is a subject directory with more than 16,000 reliable librarian sources, which Kearns said held a wide range of topics for online researchers. Kearns said each entry is reviewed twice before being listed on the Internet.

Kearns said she also suggested the Internet Public Library, a Web site that records useful sights reviewed and researched by librarians.

When using Internet resources for research, Kearns said general search engines could seem inefficient if not used correctly.

"Google is a great site, but I don't think people realize how you can use Google for what you want," Kearns said.

By entering the correct word combinations, Kearns said people could limit their searches online and even link to other Web pages.

Hale Library offers a class called "Effective Web search," which can be helpful for beginning online research, Kearns said.

When looking at Internet sources, Kearns said to look for the creator's qualifications as well as a good bibliography where information was obtained.

"Look closely at the sources," Kearns said. "Do you even know who created the Web site or how recently it's been updated?"

24 charity booths scheduled for Community Fair Saturday

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Community Fair will be Saturday at Manhattan Town Center, 3rd St., and Poyntz Ave.

This is at least the ninth year the fair has taken place at the mall, said Sara Van Allen, marketing manager of Manhattan Town Center.

"This is an opportunity for educational and non-profit agencies to come and build memberships and educate our community about their cause," she said. "They may also use this as a fund-raising opportunity."

Twenty-four groups including the American Red Cross, the Riley County Humane Society, the K-State Peace Corps, Habitat for Humanity-Manhattan and the Flint Hills Breadbasket will have booths at the fair.

Sunflower Court-Appointed Special Advocates, Inc., 115 N. 4th St., will also have a booth at the fair. The booth will have information about Sunflower CASA's services and spring volunteer information, said Jayme Morris-Hardeman, executive director of Sunflower CASA.

Sunflower CASA will also be selling a book entitled "What I've Learned About Life on the Prairie" for $14.95.

The book is filled with stories and poetry contributions from area students.

Some contributions are titled "We are the State of Sunflowers, but We Don't Know Dorothy and Toto" and "The Weatherman is Always Wrong: Kansas Weather is Unpredictable."

The Flint Hills Breadbasket, 905 Yuma St., will also have a booth at the fair and hopes to raise awareness of its services, said assistant director Danielle Carrillo.

The Flint Hills Breadbasket will offer brochures and other visual materials and discuss volunteer opportunities available throughout the year, Carrillo said.

"We want to continue to put our name out there," she said.

Tornadoes hit hurricane-ravaged area, causing more damage to New Orleans

By Janet McConaughy
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW ORLEANS — It was bad enough when Rose Christina's home was ravaged by Hurricane Katrina.

But when a tornado blew through Thursday, tearing off the home's roof and stripping it to the bare studs, she was rethinking her earlier decision to stick it out and rebuild.

"Sell it and move," Christina advised a neighbor whose home also was damaged. "It's a sign from God."

Two tornadoes ripped through neighborhoods already hit hard by Katrina just five months earlier, battering the airport and knocking down utility poles and a radio tower. No serious injuries were reported, but weary residents couldn't help but ask what else they would have to endure.

"Don't ever ask the question, 'What else could happen?'" said Marcia Paul Leone, a mortgage banker who was surveying the new damage to her Katrina-flooded home.

She would go no farther than the front porch of her house Thursday morning. Windows were blown out, and the building appeared to be leaning.

"I've been in the mortgage business for 20 years. I know when something's unsafe," she said.

Electricity was knocked out for most of the morning at Louis Armstrong International Airport, grounding passenger flights and leaving travelers to wait in a dimly lit terminal powered by generators. The storm also ripped off part of a concourse roof, slammed one jetway into another, and flipped motorized runway luggage carts.

"There's more damage to the terminal than I saw during the hurricane," airport spokeswoman Michelle Dufour said.

Wind tore an exhaust vent off another roof and blew it through a concourse window. A metal ladder was wrapped around a light pole, and part of a glass wall fell and crashed onto the tarmac.

Airlines using the damaged concourse were moved temporarily to other gates.

The line of severe thunderstorms moved across the area several hours before dawn. Tim Destri, of the National Weather Service, said it appeared the damage was caused by two tornadoes, one that hit the airport and another that moved into New Orleans.

The storm collapsed at least one house in New Orleans' hurricane-ravaged lakefront, police said.

"I cannot believe this. We were hit twice. It's not bad enough we got 11 feet of water," said Maria Kay Chetta, a city grants manager.

President Bush plans to ask Senate for $439.3 billion defense budget

By Lolita C. Baldor
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush next week will request a $439.3 billion Defense Department budget for 2007, a nearly 5 percent increase over this year, according to senior Pentagon officials and documents obtained Thursday by The Associated Press.

The spending plan would include $84.2 billion for weapons programs, a nearly 8 percent increase, including billions of dollars for fighter jets, Navy ships, helicopters and unmanned aircraft. The total includes a substantial increase in weapons spending for the Army, which will get $16.8 billion in the 2007 budget, compared with $11 billion this year.

Senior defense officials provided the totals on condition of anonymity because the defense budget will not be publicly released until Monday.

The figures did not include about $50 billion that Bush administration officials said Thursday they would request as a down payment for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2007. The administration said war costs for 2006 would total $120 billion.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would not provide any details of the budget Thursday but called it appropriate, adding: "We have been able to fund the important things that are needed. It is a sizable amount of money."

The budget proposal represents the fifth year in a row that spending on weapons has increased, after years of cutbacks during the 1990s.

It also provides funding for 42 Army Brigade Combat Teams as part of the ongoing effort to increase the number of combat units from 33. The expansion would allow soldiers to spend two years at their home station for every year they are deployed to a war front.

Overall, the Army would receive $111.8 billion, including $42.6 billion for personnel. The Army National Guard would receive about $5.25 billion for personnel, and the Army Reserves would receive $3.4 billion.

The documents say the budget plan will provide the funding needed to win the long war on terror, recruit and retain troops, and continue the transformation to a more agile fighting force for the 21st century.

The Army's key weapons program, the Future Combat System, will be funded at $2.2 billion, and there will be $583 million to buy nearly 3,100 more heavily armored Humvees. The budget also includes nearly $800 million for 100 Stryker transport vehicles.

During a speech Thursday, Rumsfeld said the Pentagon is learning to do more with less.

"We are finding ways to operate that department in ways that are considerably more efficient and more respectful of taxpayers' dollars," he said. "We are getting much more for the dollar today than we were five years ago."

In other budget programs, the Air Force will receive about $2.2 billion for the F-22 fighter — slashing the 2006 total nearly in half. The drop in funding, however, is actually a contract restructuring that would return that money — and more — over the long run by stretching out the program for an additional two years and buying four more planes. The new plan calls for buying 20 aircraft each year in 2008, 2009 and 2010, rather than 56 in the next two years.

The Navy will receive about $2.5 billion for the next Virginia Class submarine, and there is $360 million in the budget for development of the new CH53K heavy lift helicopter for the Marine Corps.

Other programs in the budget include:

- $5.6 billion to support a wide variety of programs to address the multiple needs of military families, including child care, family counseling, tuition assistance and family centers.

- About $1.8 billion for 81 Army Black Hawk and Navy Hawk helicopters.

- $1.3 billion for five of the new Joint Strike Fighters.

Congress extends Patriot Act 5 weeks

By Laurie Kellman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Congress sent President Bush a second five-week extension of the Patriot Act as Senate negotiators worked to close a deal with the White House on renewing the antiterrorism law with some new civil liberties protections.

"We need the Patriot Act," said Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter. "I'm prepared to work on it further to improve it."

Sixteen provisions of the 2001 law were to have expired last Dec. 31, but Congress extended them until Friday after Democrats and a handful of Senate Republicans demanded an avenue of appeals when the FBI makes demands for people's financial and other private records.

The Senate voted 95-1 Thursday night to extend the current law unchanged through March 10 and give negotiators more time to reach a deal. Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., a longtime opponent of the Patriot Act, cast the sole vote against the extension. The House passed it Wednesday.

Several Republican and Democratic officials involved in negotiations said that agreements had been reached on several issues but that others needed more time.

Earlier in the week, Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, one of the negotiators who helped block the act's renewal last year, told reporters almost all of his concerns had been worked out with the White House.

He and Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H., want parts of the act to be rewritten in several areas, including giving banks, libraries and Internet service providers the right to appeal when the FBI seeks financial and other records of their customers and clients.

Senate Democrats and four libertarian-leaning Republicans had blocked a final vote on a measure negotiated by the White House that would have made permanent most expiring provisions. The Republicans were concerned about excessive police powers.

The law makes it easier for federal agents to gather and share information in terrorism investigations, install wiretaps and conduct secret searches of households and businesses. At issue are 16 provisions that Congress wanted reviewed and renewed by the end of last year.

Sens. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., Conrad Burns, R-Mont., Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Trent Lott, R-Miss., did not vote.

Coalition turning to keep sex education in schools

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A coalition including abortion rights advocates and liberal political groups is turning to legislators to keep local school boards from canceling sex education classes or going to abstinence-only courses.

A State Board of Education regulation requiring all districts to offer sex education expired last year, and the board split 5-5 over requiring districts to get parents' permission before having students take such courses.

That led to a proposed bill from Advocates for Abstinence Plus. The coalition includes groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union and Planned Parenthood of Kansas and Mid-Missouri, but it also has support from ministers, parents, students and health advocates.

The Senate Education Committee agreed Thursday to sponsor the coalition's proposal, which would require districts to offer comprehensive sex education courses emphasizing "the benefits of abstinence," while still teaching students about AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases.

"You cannot stop sexual experimentation. You can only stop risky behavior based on inaccurate information," Stephanie Bell, a 17-year-old senior at Blue Valley North High School in Overland Park, said at a Statehouse news conference. "When our parents won't teach us about our bodies, we seek information elsewhere."

But state board chairman Steve Abrams, of Arkansas City, Kan., said the proposal appears to be asking legislators to decide what should be taught and, "It sounds like something the state board ought have authority to deal with."

For almost two decades, the board required sex education classes. But as it revised rules for accrediting schools, it allowed the regulation to lapse.

Separately, the board considered new health standards meant to advise school districts on their courses. Some board members didn't like most districts' policy of automatically enrolling students in sex education courses, requiring parents to object in writing to remove their children.

Health advocates worry that if the board won't let districts enroll students in classes automatically, fewer children will take the courses. Some also have concerns that districts will admonish teenagers not to have sex before marriage — without giving them information on other topics.

"We don't live in an ideal world," said Angie Blair, an elementary school nurse from Lawrence.

Students cut pills to save money

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To keep prescription prices affordable, pharmacists suggest patients cut their pills to cut on costs.

Mark Brown-Barnett, director of the Lafene Health Center Pharmacy, said splitting pills to save money is a practice he and his colleagues tell patients to think about.

"We encourage it on certain medications," Brown-Barnett said. "We encourage them to save money."

Depending on the makeup of the pill, Brown-Barnett said some tablets cannot be cut.

"Not all tablets are 'splittable,'" he said. "You really have to talk to the pharmacist because some tablets can break or will crush. It depends on the kind of situation and how the tablets are made."

Brown-Barnett said when prescriptions come in, the pharmacy will call the physicians to see if the pills can be cut in half. If prescriptions call for an increasing dosage, splitting cannot occur.

For students coming to pick up medication, the concept of splitting pills to save on cash is still a relatively new idea, Brown-Barnett said.

"The idea is somewhat new to them, so we tell them you can save," he said. "With the revenue of college students, they're happy to save money."

Although prices vary, Brown-Barnett said the difference between dosages can often range between $5 and $10 per 100 tablets.

Jennifer Lang, junior in pre-pharmacy, said for people paying with cash, the price could be more significant than those with insurance.

"If you're paying with cash, it really makes a difference if you can't afford a 30-day supply," said Lang, a pharmacy technician at the Medicine Shoppe, 461 E. Poyntz Ave.

Paul Hayen, pharmacist at the Medicine Shoppe, said cutting pills depends on the manufacturer and tablet.

Many time-released tablets and all caplets are not to be split, and Hayen said cutting medicinal patches will ruin the delivery system of the medicine.

The trend of cutting prices by cutting pills has been a consistent trend for the past four or five years, Hayen said, and physicians and pharmacists have been trying to help people save on costly medications.

If a patient wants to know if they can get a higher dosage and split the pills, Hayen said he suggested talking to the physician or pharmacist for more information.

"Before you split, you need to see a pharmacist," he said.

Islamics protest over Muhammad cartoons

By Ibrahim Barzak
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — Outrage over caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad escalated in the Arab and Islamic world Thursday, with Palestinian gunmen briefly kidnapping a German citizen and protesters in Pakistan chanting "death to France" and "death to Denmark."

Palestinian militants surrounded European Union headquarters in Gaza, and gunmen burst into several hotels and apartments in the West Bank in search of foreigners to take hostage.

The protests spread to Indonesia on Friday, with Islamic hardliners barging into a building housing the Danish Embassy and burning the European country's flag. The Indonesian government had earlier condemned the drawings, as did Afghanistan.

In Iraq, Islamic leaders urged worshippers to stage demonstrations following weekly prayer services Friday. Iran summoned the Austrian ambassador, whose country holds the EU presidency.

The issue opened divisions among European Union governments. Austrian Foreign Minister Ursula Plassnik said EU leaders have a responsibility to "clearly condemn" insults to any religion. But French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy said he preferred "an excess of caricature to an excess of censorship."

Sarkozy joined journalists in rallying around the editorial director of France Soir, who was fired by the newspaper's Egyptian owner. France Soir and several other newspapers across Europe reprinted the caricatures this week in a show of support for freedom of expression.

The cartoons were first published in September in a Danish newspaper, touching off anger among Muslims who knew about it. The issue reignited last week after Saudi Arabia recalled its ambassador to Denmark.

The Danish newspaper, Jyllands-Posten, had asked 40 cartoonists to draw images of the prophet. The purpose, its chief editor said, was "to examine whether people would succumb to self-censorship, as we have seen in other cases when it comes to Muslim issues."

Islamic law, based on clerics' interpretation of the Quran and the sayings of the prophet, forbids depictions of the Prophet Muhammad and other major religious figures, even positive ones, to prevent idolatry. Shiite Muslim clerics differ in that they allow images of their greatest saint, Ali, the prophet's son-in-law, though not Muhammad.

Critics say the drawings were particularly insulting because some appeared to ridicule Muhammad. One cartoon showed the prophet wearing a turban shaped as a bomb.

France's Grand Rabbi Joseph Sitruk said he shared Muslim anger.

"We gain nothing by lowering religions, humiliating them and making caricatures of them. It's a lack of honesty and respect," he said. He said freedom of expression "is not a right without limits."

In the Arab world, a Jordanian newspaper, Shihani, took the bold step Thursday of running some of the drawings, saying it wanted to show its readers how offensive the cartoons were but also urging the world's Muslims to "be reasonable." Its editorial noted that Jyllands-Posten had apologized, "but for some reason, nobody in the Muslim world wants to hear the apology."

About 70 hardline Muslims threw eggs at the building housing the Danish Embassy in Indonesia, pushed their way past security guards and briefly milled in the lobby. They then tore down the Danish flag from outside the building and set it on fire. The protesters also briefly stopped outside an Indonesian newspaper that ran one of the cartoons on its Web site Thursday to illustrate a story on the uproar.

The outrage Thursday was most tangible in the Palestinian territories, where Norway and Denmark closed diplomatic offices after masked gunmen threatened to kidnap foreigners in Gaza.

Palestinian gunmen in the West Bank searched several hotels, and a German citizen was briefly kidnapped by gunmen from a hotel in the city of Nablus. Palestinian police freed the German, a teacher, after less than an hour.

Foreign reporters either pulled out of Gaza on Thursday or canceled plans to go to the coastal strip.

Palestinian security officials said they would try to protect foreigners in Gaza. Nineteen foreigners have been kidnapped in Gaza in recent months; all were freed unharmed.

The protests in the Palestinian territories came a week after the Islamic militant group Hamas defeated the ruling Fatah Party in parliamentary elections.

In one unusual twist, Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas leader, visited a Gaza church Thursday and promised protection to Christians after Fatah gunmen threatened to target churches as part of their protests. Zahar offered to dispatch gunmen from Hamas' military wing, the Izzedine al Qassam Brigades, to guard the church.

"You are our brothers," Zahar told Father Manuel Musallam of the Holy Family Church.

"It's a significant loss to all members of our K-State

Ron said White was pleasant to be around, and he liked working around students.

"As long as he was serving the students of Kansas State,

Burns said key players in the issue were Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement; Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance; and Pat Bosco, dean of student life.

Burns said he and Student Body Vice President Grant Groene made a campaign promise last spring to eliminate the fees and encompass them in tuition.

"We are extremely excited after a lot of work," Burns said.

To reconcile the elimination of fees, in-state tuition will increase about .9 percent and out-of-state tuition will increase .2 percent in the 2007 fiscal year. The tuition increase averages to about $1.50 per credit hour, Burns said.

Student Body Vice President Grant Groene said he had recently heard student complaints of the transcript fee. The elimination of the fees will benefit the entire student body, Groene said.

"It is good for students to see that those who run for office follow through with their promises," he said.

Burns said he thought the elimination will be favorable among students.

PRINCE | Wildcats return 18 starters in the fall

grade for K-State is the lowest in the Big 12.

But despite what others think of K-State's recruiting class, Prince is pleased with each of the 27 young men who signed on Wednesday.

"I am really excited about this signing class," he said.

K-State will showcase the majority of its new speed on defense, as 17 of the 27 signed recruits are listed as defensive players.

The eight new defensive backs – an eye-opening number – run an average of about 4.45 seconds in the 40-yard dash.

But the players who caught my attention, along with the beast of a quarterback named Josh Freeman, are the running backs – Courtney Greer, James Johnson, Leon Patton and Jamal Schulters.

Greer, a 5-foot-10, 210 pounder from Midland, Texas, has a good blend of size and speed. Scouts Inc. ranks him as the No. 47 running back in the country. He could end up playing fullback, filling the void left by Victor Mann.

Johnson is a 5-foot-11, 200-pound stud from Port Arthur, Texas, and is possibly Prince's second-best recruit behind Freeman. He was rated with four-stars by both Rivals.com and Scouts.com. Rivals.com also rated him as the No. 10 overall junior college prospect in the nation.

Patton, from Cedar Hill, Texas, is listed as a generous 5-foot-8, 175 pounds. He reminds me of Darren Sproles on film, and he appears to have more open-field speed than Sproles. Scout.com considers him a four-star prospect, and Rivals.com gave him three stars.

Schulters, from Brooklyn, N.Y., is an explosive player at 5-foot-10, 180 pounds. He can play a variety of positions, and he will probably return kicks at some point in his collegiate career.

He may even play in the secondary like his older brother, Miami Dolphins strong safety Lance Schulters.

With 18 returning K-State starters and a number of recruits who could pay immediate dividends, including 10 junior-college transfers, Prince has me believing K-State can contend for the Big 12 North title next season.

Can you feel the excitement?

TENNIS | Lady Raiders have proven tougher to beat

"We have been working on the transaction from defense to offense," Mendez said. "Tamar is a player that is very offensive on the court, and she likes to play hard. However, she has trouble moving from offense to defense."

Changing her thought process, from a mostly offensive-minded game to more of a balanced approach, has been difficult, Kvaratskhelia said.

"Most of the time, I'm on the offensive, so it's kind of hard to go from defense to offense," Kvaratskhelia said. "The last couple days we've been working on that."

Making Kvaratskhelia a more complete player is the main focus right now, Bietau said. She needs to exploit her advantage in speed by running down shots and making a clean return, he said.

"She's capable of running all day," Bietau said. "At the moments when she's not in position to win the point, it's clearly to her advantage to just keep the point going."

The Wildcats, as a team, worked all week on their serves, an aspect Bietau said was inconsistent against Drake.

K-State's No. 1 doubles duo of senior Jessica Simosa and freshman Katerina Kudlackova conveyed the style of play that Bietau said he wants to see more of.

"Our No. 1 doubles team last weekend was a good example of what we want to do," Bietau said. "They came out and started hitting first serves, and they established control of the match, momentum and never allowed a way for the other team to get in."

K-State (1-0) will try to display the same airtight play this Sunday when the team travels to Texas Tech for its first Big 12 Conference duals match. The Wildcats defeated the Red Raiders last year in Manhattan, 5-2.

Simosa said Texas Tech has shown improvement every year she has faced them.

"My freshman year was really easy to beat them but as the years have gone by they have gotten tougher," Simosa said.

"Last year we won 5-2, but there were a couple of really tough matches that could have gone either way."

"That was at home, and now we have to go play at (Texas Tech)."

However, a slip-up now would be unacceptable, Kvaratskhelia said.

"We have to go forward and not back, so we need to win this," Kvaratskhelia said. "I think we have to beat them because last year we beat them, so if we don't win this year then we are not taking steps forward."

COWBOYS | Stewart recruited by Cowboys

Stewart said Coach Sutton showed initial interest in him but decided not to offer him a scholarship.

"They recruited me a little bit and came to a couple of my practices, but they never offered," Stewart said.

Stewart was without his fellow point guard, Mario Taybron, Wednesday against Baylor.

Assistant Sports Information Director Tom Gilbert said Taybron's friend passed away, which prevented him from playing.

Gilbert and Stewart said guard Taybron practiced Thursday and will most likely be ready to play on Saturday.

Memorial for White tonight

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Visitation for Paul D. White will be 7-8:30 tonight at Yorgensen-Meloan-Londeen Funeral Chapel, 1616 Poyntz Ave. A memorial service will be at 10 a.m. Tuesday at the funeral home.

White, 50, died early Thursday morning at Mercy Regional Health Center after he fell down an elevator shaft in Haymaker Hall.

Since he joined K-State in 2000, White worked as senior electrician and elevator specialist for Housing and Dining Services.

Cheryl May, assistant vice president of K-State Media Relations, said Friday that K-State Police are still investigating how far White fell and what caused his fall.

White was born Nov. 29, 1955, in Manhattan and was a lifetime Manhattan resident. In 1973, he graduated from Manhattan High School. He worked for White's Electric and Larry's Electric before coming to K-State.

Europe is in turmoil with the Muslim world over 12 caricatures of the Islam prophet Muhammad published by several European newspapers.

Saeed Al Salim, freshman in computer science, said he thinks it is disappointing to see the satirical cartoons in newspapers.

"They should respect the difference between religions," Al Salim said. "They shouldn't draw Muhammad in this way."

Al Salim said his friends in Egypt were upset about the caricatures, condemning the negative references to Muhammad and Islam.

"They are giving the wrong idea [about how] it goes in

Flu, viruses can be spread at local, international levels

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The word "epidemic" might trigger thoughts of the bubonic plague in the 1300s or historically contagious diseases like smallpox or the measles. But recent outbreaks such as the 2002 occurrences of severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) and the avian influenza, or bird flu, might have brought the term "epidemic" into the next century.

Several factors influence how a disease is spread, said Charles Murphy, health officer and director of the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department.

Murphy said influenza, or the flu, is one of the most common diseases in Kansas. He said it is spread by respiratory droplets transmitted when someone coughs or sneezes.

The flu is highly contagious and can easily be spread when people use public items that could have been contaminated by someone with the virus, Murphy said.

"We think a virus can live on a doorknob for about two days," he said. "Handrails, shaking hands - that's how the flu gets spread."

Vaccination is one way to fight, Murphy said, but often the flu vaccines are given to the elderly when young school children might be targets for the flu.

"The virus spreads most quickly in preschools, where there's lots of sneezes and coughs," Murphy said. "The question is, who we should be vaccinating, which should be the high priority group."

An outbreak of a disease is categorized as an epidemic when the number of cases outgrows the expected number.

"It depends on how many deaths are caused by disease during an outbreak," Murphy said. "If the mortality rate is above average, the outbreak is an epidemic."

In a Jan. 25 Reuters article, researchers suggested the possibility of predicting the spread of infectious disease by tracking the geographical circulation of money.

Murphy said he was unfamiliar with the article's research and was unsure if predicting outbreaks was possible.

"I don't think you could predict outbreaks, but we have a surveillance system," Murphy said. "If it is something treatable, the earlier you get to it the better."

To protect from disease, Murphy said people could go to the extreme by wearing gloves, masks and eye protection, but the reality is, being completely protected Engineering students will have a chance to meet with more than 80 employers Tuesday at the Engineering Career Fair.

"It offers all students the chance to find a summer internship or full-time position," said Peter Robl, senior in industrial engineering. "It also gives the students a chance to network with numerous representatives for a large group of companies."

A record number of employers will be attending the fair, with an increase from 75 booths last year to 88 this year, which gives students increasing opportunities, said Leah Nordhus, administrative assistant in the dean's office for the College of Engineering.

"With an increase of almost 30 percent in the number of employers attending the engineering career fair from last year, opportunities for students are abundant," she said. "We have 88 booths this year with companies attending from throughout the United States."

Not only is there an increase in number of employers, but the job market is the highest it has been in years, said Jessica Wolff, assistant director of Career and Employment Services.

"According to a recent report by the National Association of Colleges and Employers, the job outlook for the class of 2006 is the best it's been in four years," she said. "The report found that employers expect to hire 14.5 percent more new college graduates in 2005-2006."

For tips on preparing for the fair, students can consult the CES Web site. Wolff said it is important for students to come in feeling prepared and comfortable talking with employers.

"The Career and Employment Web site is very important for students to look at," she said. "They can see who is coming and choose five to 10 employers they would like to

Ferry capsizes near Egypt, kills 195

It was a story told over and over by survivors of the sunken ferry. A fire in the hold raged out of control and smoke engulfed the ship during a rough Red Sea crossing. Passengers gathered on deck looking for life jackets and lifeboats but found no help from the crew.

By the end of Sunday, three days after the Al-Salaam Boccaccio 98 went down about 55 miles off the Egyptian coast, just 401 of about 1,400 passengers had been rescued.

A total of 195 bodies have been recovered, leaving about 800 others missing.

FEMINIST BETTY FRIEDAN DIES

Betty Friedan, whose manifesto "The Feminine Mystique" became a bestseller in the 1960s and laid the groundwork for the modern feminist movement, died Saturday, her birthday. She was 85.

Friedan died at her home of congestive heart failure, a cousin, Emily Bazelon said.

USS COLE ATTACK PLANNER ESCAPES FROM PRISON

An al-Qaeda operative sentenced to death for plotting the USS Cole bombing that killed 17 sailors in 2000 was among a group of convicts who escaped from a Yemen prison last week, Interpol said Sunday in issuing a global security alert.

Officials set up checkpoints around the capital of Sana'a, where the prison was located, to try to catch the escapees before they could flee to the protection of mountain tribes, according to a Yemeni security official speaking on condition of anonymity.

COURT BLOCKS ABORTION RECORDS

The state's highest court temporarily stopped the state attorney general from looking at records from two abortion clinics.

The Kansas Supreme Court on Friday ordered a lower court judge to first make sure that Attorney General Phill Kline has the right to see the documents in his investigation of potential violations of state restrictions on abortion and suspected rapes of children.

ARMSTRONG, CROW BREAK UP

STATE PARKS IN KANSAS SUFFER FROM LACK OF FUNDING

Kansas ranks last in the nation in state funding for its 24 parks, according to the National Association of State Park Directors. And it's getting worse.

Funding cuts have affected everything from basic park maintenance, to the number of rangers available to patrol the parks.

Corrections and clarifications

There were two errors in Friday's Collegian.
■ The article "Student health fee to increase" on Page 1 said "Students enrolled in 12 or more credit hours will pay an additional $102.07 for health costs in 2007," but it should have said students will pay a total of $102.07 for health care costs in 2007.
■ The article "Policy proposal focuses on making colleges accountable with testing" on Page 7 said Judith Richards was the dean of the College of Education, but her title is instructor and facilitator.
If you see something that should be corrected, call news editor Matt Girard at (785) 532-6556 or e-mail collegian@pub.ksu.edu.

K-State students compete in campus College Bowl

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Union Program Council hosted a campus-wide College Bowl Tournament on Saturday.

Eight, four-person teams competed against one another by answering trivia questions from an array of categories ranging from pop culture to sports to history.

The teams included a group of fraternity members, a group of K-State College Bowl Club members and a team with a member who had tried out for Jeopardy.

The teams competed for the opportunity to advance to the regional College Bowl Tournament, which will take place Feb. 24 and 25 at K-State, said Laura Jones, graduate assistant for the UPC Special Programs Committee.

Although most teams approached the competition with complete seriousness, one team took a more light-hearted approach to the tournament.

"We made T-shirts for intimidation," said Ian Hartsig, sophomore in architectural engineering and member of Phi Kappa Theta fraternity.

The tournament was double elimination, with each round consisting of two, eight-minute halves.

"Competition rules are very similar to quiz bowls or scholarship bowls that are done in high school," Jones said.

After a little more than three hours of competition, the tournament's final round came down to a match between two of K-State's four College Bowl Club teams.

The winning team consisted of Andy Jurgensmeier, senior in biochemistry; Mike Uphoff, sophomore in history; Elizabeth Voigt, junior in mechanical engineering; and Fidel Bamian, graduate student in history.

The club teams meet every Friday night in Union 206, said Stephen Chapes, club member and senior in architectural engineering.

Meetings are devoted to answering questions in order to prepare teams for competition.

The teams participate in about five tournaments each year, Chapes said.

Last year a team traveled to North Carolina and Oklahoma for competition.

Anyone who is interested in joining the club can come to one of its Friday meetings.

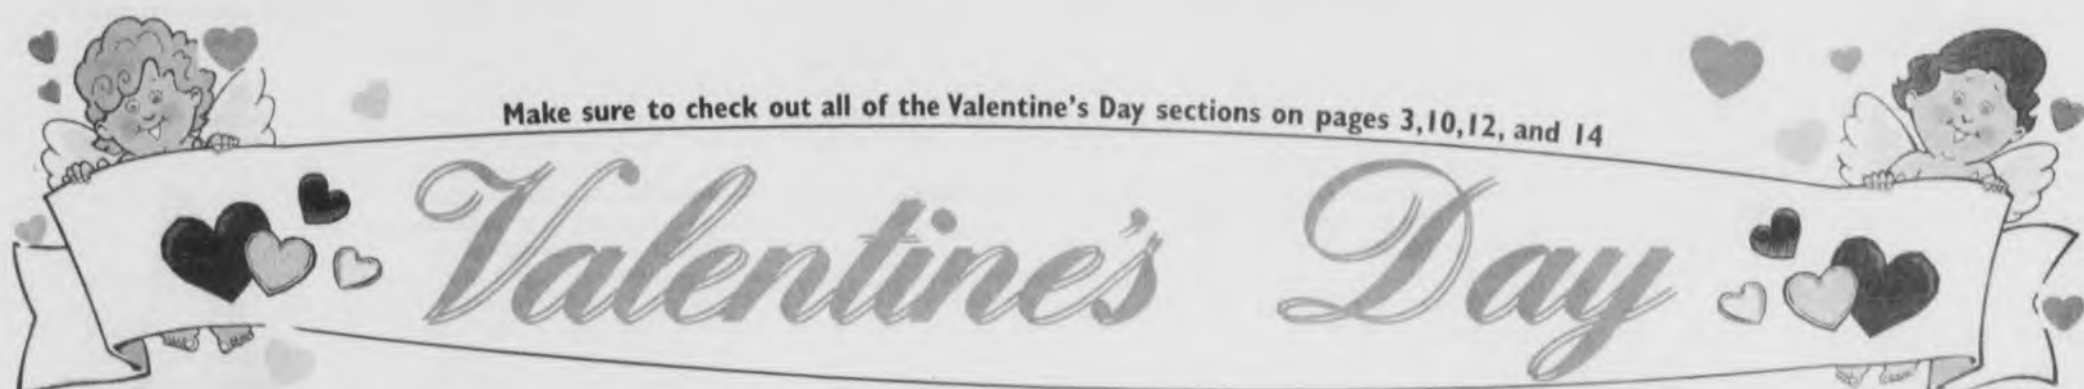

"I encourage anyone to join the organization who has an interest in knowledge," Chapes said.

Kenny Uphoff, sophomore in history, answers a bonus question on behalf of his College Bowl team.

TO THE POINT Avoid spreading germs simply by washing hands

You do have options, beyond getting an influenza vaccine, of ways to avoid the flu and other highly contagious diseases.

Simple hygiene could help stomp out the spread of possible epidemics. To avoid coming into contact with viruses that can live outside the body, it is best to wash your hands as often as possible.

Frequent hand-washing is one of the best ways to prevent the spread of infectious diseases. When viruses can live on a doorknob for two days, wouldn't it be better to have a defense against it?

However, those who already suffer from the flu or any other illness also can take precautions against spreading it.

Avoid coughing directly onto objects like computer keyboards, especially if they are shared items.

Also, cough into your arm rather than your hand, so you are not spreading the virus to more objects as you touch them.

Teachers should protect their students from coming into contact with viruses as well. Make it known to students who are genuinely sick that missing class to avoid spreading the illness is understandable.

Employers should also be understanding when an employee calls in sick. There may be instances when people abuse sick-day policies, but when a contagious disease is involved, it would be safer and more effective to have that person stay home.

Anything you can do.... Science shows females surpass males overall

I traveled back in time a few nights ago to kindergarten, when, in a moment of poor judgment, my boyfriend and I had a "pretend" fight about who was better, boys or girls.

I understand the fight was silly, but it made me think of all the recent times when boys have "pretended" to be better than girls by saying things like, "Get in the kitchen and make me a sandwich, haha."

So, in honor of my boyfriend and his "joking" remarks, I decided to look into the matter, and lucky me, Newsweek had just published an article about the topic.

The Jan. 30 Newsweek article, "The Boy Crisis," said boys are falling behind girls in every subject, from elementary school to college.

Did you know boys are different, biologically and psychologically, from girls?

Of course, all girls know this if they know a guy.

And how about the fact that girls mature faster than boys?

Newsweek tells us at age 5, "girls are more fluent than boys and can sight-read more words." I am so glad a scientist finally discovered that. I know girls who have known it since they were born. I am guessing the scientist probably was a guy, because it took longer to get to this conclusion.

But, to give guys credit, at age 5, they have better hand-eye coordination.

This works well because it allows them to play video games for hours. Maybe that is the reason boys now only make up 44 percent of the student population. Or maybe they are still trying to get to college since boys are 60 percent more likely to repeat at least one grade. However, this could be because boys are 47 percent more likely to have learning disabilities and twice as likely to be placed in special-education classes.

Apparently, this is because they don't want to feel weak and ask for help.

Scientists uncovered this fact through male monkeys.

Monkeys fight each other to "establish and maintain their place in the hierarchy of the tribe." I think I recognize fighting to "maintain their place" in my boyfriend and his friends. Guys fight all the time, and, come to think of it, they do resemble monkeys.

They are 78 percent more likely to get injured in a fight. Just that fact alone should show how much smarter girls are than boys.

Girls, on the other hand, are doing quite well. In the mid-1990s girls had "reduced the gap in math and more girls than boys were taking high-school-level biology and chemistry," according to Newsweek.

Imagine where women are now.

Women use their brains more efficiently than men and we are more likely to attend class and have better motor skills. We are catching up and surpassing boys. On average, middle school girls score 21 points higher on standardized writing tests and high school girls score 16 points higher on standardized reading tests.

Did you know teenage girls can also process information faster?

Thirty years ago, it wasn't that women weren't smart, it was that we were being told to have babies and be housewives. Now we have opportunities to really shine, and we are going for it.

We are less likely to drop out of high school. Men are 33 percent more likely to do so. High school girls are 36 percent more likely to take an Advanced Placement or honors class, and — here's where we really excel — more girls are taking leadership roles, like class officer or yearbook editor.

No wonder 22 percent more high school girls are planning to go to college than boys.

We are aware we can do things better than boys, and now we are proving it. It may be that we still don't get paid as much as men do in the work world, but we sure are making way to overcoming that fast.

So instead of asking "who's better?" let's ask, "how long will it be until boys understand girls are better?"

Parking issues lead to motorist frustrations

Watch them sometime. They frolic around in their little blue vests with reflector tape and big bold letters indicating who they work for so boldly even the blind can read.

They wear their vests with pride. They are the Parking Services employees. Out of humbleness they call themselves "Parking Nazis." They only want you to think they're meant to be a burden. A burden that takes pride in the misfortune they bring to others, but this is just not true.

They're the bastions of all things holy at K-State — long live the "Attempted-Good-Parking-Situations-for-Everyone" doctrine they uphold. This doctrine is designed to increase available parking spots for those who follow the rules.

However, the reason students don't follow the rules is because there are not enough spaces in the first place.

Oh, but what if you show up right as they issue the ticket?

It's just tough luck for you, buddy.

You can explain to them that there isn't enough parking on campus. You can tell them you waited 30 minutes for a spot just to have some ridiculously big truck cut you off and steal it at the last moment.

You can tell them you get to the parking lot at the same time everyday, and there is always a spot. However, today there were 1,000 spots saved for students who may come to this university — those poor fools who think they're going to have a parking spot — and there were none available.

You can tell them your grandma died, and you left her funeral early to get a spot, and there were none but the handicapped stalls left.

They are so devoted to the cause of "Attempted-Good-Parking-Situations-for-Everyone" they don't even hear the excuses. Their divine devotion is to be adored.

With all of that said, I understand the "Parking Nazis" are students with parking needs, also.

Perhaps I am placing the blame completely in the wrong place. Maybe what we really need is for the "Parking Nazis" to be on our side.

They can strike, refusing to work for an organization that oversells permits. We can all unite and demand one convenient parking spot per person at any given time of day.

If the fact that we pay thousands of dollars a year in tuition and fees isn't enough to get a spot, then we need something more on our side. Yes, that's the spirit.

Maybe I've been too harsh on the "Parking Nazis." If we can channel their misguided devotion to the parking situation at K-State for good, we can fix this problem.

Once we resolve this issue maybe we can fry the bigger fish. We can start a revolution fixing all of the seemingly trivial but essentially underrated problems of K-State.

Next, we will take our newly-founded revolt to Hale Library. We will destroy those who stand in the way of our homework and online quizzes so they can Facebook.

We will turn the library from a phone booth back into a house of quietness and books. Godspeed.

Language convention participants examine education issues

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last weekend professors, doctors, and guest speakers from all over the world gathered in the K-State Student Union for the annual Kansas Association of Teachers and Educators for Speakers of Other Languages and Bilingual Educators.

"It's a good opportunity to share insight, expertise and voice," said Della Perez, KATESOL/BE president and associate director and assistant professor for the College of Education.

The speakers had lectures, classes and discussion groups for educators from all over the state of Kansas.

"The teachers and principals will be learning strategies for class, state-wide issues and cross cultural connections," Perez said.

The event had formal instructional classes, renowned speakers and discussion group sessions.

"I went to a class with Dr. Diane Torres-Velasquez that taught us how to use some of the latest computer programs for the different learning opportunities that are available," said Sawana Shipley, teacher of English as a Second Language and reading at Union Valley Elementary School.

"We also learned many new techniques," Shipley said. "Here we learned a thematic approach to teaching that helps give meaning to what the students are learning."

Sawana explained the ideas behind a thematic approach to holistic learning.

"If you're teaching young international students how to read 'Johnny Appleseed,' you can also teach them the science and let their knowledge expand through all fields," she said. "If you can do something thematic, it gives the students something they can understand."

This event gave the teachers a chance to network with many professional educators from all over Kansas and to share their teaching systems.

"I am here speaking about our educational model 'No train, no gain,'" said Geri Lovelace, English as a Second Language teacher. Lovelace was from USD 500 in Kansas City, Kan. "It's always good to hear what people are doing and then take that back with you."

Through national, local and international speakers, teachers learned about current debated issues surrounding the education process.

"Now we really see anti-immigration movements focused more specifically on immigrant children," said Melinda Lewis, director of policy advocacy and research at El Centro Inc., Kansas City, Kan.

Lewis was a keynote guest speaker for the conference and talked about current issues and trends in Kansas.

"This debate is really about who belongs here and who doesn't," Lewis said. "By taking this away we would be saying, 'You don't belong and we are going make sure you never do.' We need to get away from categorizing students and focus on children's education as a whole."

The convention also focused on being aware of cultural differences and accepting them.

"In Mayan culture, for example, knees are considered sexually stimulating and when Mayan women were adopted into local Latin public schools, their uniforms revealed the knee and made them feel as if they were flashing," said guest instructor Katherine Langon. Langon has received a Ph.D. from Georgetown and has done field work in South America.

"To the Mayans, clothing is extremely symbolic, so being told what they had to wear was a slap in the face," she said.

Speaker: Classes must involve Hispanic children

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 50 students received several pearls of wisdom in a speech Friday afternoon in Forum Hall.

The speaker was Manuel Escamilla, director of Rocky Mountain Service, Employment, Redevelopment Head Start, which serves 2,100 children in Colorado, according to its Web site.

During the speech, "Keys to Networking," Escamilla said networking referred to the building of networks by people organized for a certain cause.

He told the audience that to be good teachers, they must know why they want to teach.

"Loving children is not enough," Escamilla said.

The speech focused on Hispanic and Latino culture and how educators must work to include them.

"There are a lot of people in the U.S. that don't speak English," he said. "For that reason, you have to speak for them."

Escamilla used both English and Spanish in his speech, often turning to the latter to tell a joke.

"The type of jokes he uses, we're familiar with (it)," said Noemi Rueda, a student from Seward County Community College who was at the conference through Division of Continuing Education.

Escamilla took time to make a special message to the women in the audience on how to deal with cultural views that allow men in some parts of Hispanic and Latino culture to mistreat them.

"You are not our servants," he said. "You are not here just to have children. You are not here to serve our every need. You don't owe us anything."

Most audience members were students who had received a scholarship to study to become bilingual educators. Some were from K-State and others were from schools linked to K-State through its Division of Continuing Education.

The speech was part of a larger conference for Kansas Association of Teachers of English to Speakers of Other Languages and Bilingual Educators.

Rita Rivas, also a student at SCCC, said she received a positive message from the speech.

"It's about how... we're the ones who are going to make a difference in the future," Rivas said.

Escamilla's speech lasted one hour. He spent more than 30 minutes speaking with several audience members afterward.

"One of the most important things is the responsibility they have to educate our community," Escamilla said of the audience after the session.

Cats fall to Oklahoma State in final seconds

K-State's Lance Harris tries to drive around Oklahoma State's Jamaal Brown on Saturday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Junior Cartier Martin didn't want to talk after K-State's 63-61 loss to Oklahoma State on Saturday. He didn't need to, though. His actions said enough.

After shaking the Cowboys' hands, Martin extended his leg with the intention of kicking the basketball. He hesitated, opted not to, and walked off the court with his head down in front of the sold-out Bramlage Coliseum crowd.

Martin, coach Jim Wooldridge and the rest of the Wildcats (12-7, 3-5 Big 12 Conference) obviously were frustrated, and the buzzer-beater loss to the Cowboys — which snapped Oklahoma State's (13-9, 3-5) four-game losing streak — gave K-State every reason to be confused.

"That was a pretty amazing way to drop that game today, and it's just really unfortunate," Wooldridge said. "We're finding ways to lose instead of finding ways to win. You come a million miles in a game, and you need to finish it in a positive way, and we haven't been able to do that."

"If it isn't one thing, it's another."

Saturday's upset cemented what has been an arduous week for the Cats, as the tilt marked the third time in seven days that K-State has fallen by four points or fewer, with close losses to Missouri and Baylor, the two worst teams in the Big 12.

"This has been the toughest week in basketball in a while. It's hard to move forward knowing we had these last couple losses," junior Lance Harris said.

Sophomore David Hoskins did what he could to help the Cats, with a game-high 18 points, but when they needed him the most in the last two seconds, a Cowboy player deflected junior Akeem Wright's inbound pass to Hoskins, handing Oklahoma State the win.

"I kept saying down the stretch with five minutes to go, we're going to have to make some more plays," Wooldridge said. "They're athletic enough that if they put enough pressure on us, we'll have to make another play or two, and we just didn't have the ability to do that on either end."

If Whisenhunt hits it off with Raiders owner Al Davis and senior personnel executive Michael Lombardi, things could progress quickly this week for the team to hire Norv Turner's successor.

NFL | Steelers win

Super Bowl, 21-10

A record-setting run. A game-turning interception. A trick play that no one saw coming.

The Pittsburgh Steelers needed every little bit of history they could get their fingers on to craft a one-for-the-books ending on Sunday, beating the Seattle Seahawks 21-10 in the Super Bowl.

Years from now, those Terrible Towel-twirling fans will recount how with one big play after another, the Steelers managed to get the ring, that perfect send-off to Jerome Bettis' career and that long-awaited Super Bowl title for coach Bill Cowher.

Not to mention, Ben Roethlisberger, at age 23, is the youngest quarterback to win a Super Bowl.

■ My official prediction 30 minutes before the game: Pittsburgh 28, Seattle 24.

■ It's awesome to see former K-State running back Josh Scobey is a captain for the Seahawks at the coin toss.

■ As is the case early in games, both defenses are playing better than the offenses. Pittsburgh just picked up its second false start on its first drive.

■ The magic fridge. That is quality. Budweiser takes the early lead on funniest commercials.

■ How did Pittsburgh's Ike Taylor not come up with that air-mailed interception?

■ Seattle wide receiver Darrell Jackson is tearing up the first quarter. He already has five catches.

■ Well, that pass interference on Jackson on what should have been a touchdown hurts. Too bad it was a good call by the refs. You just can't push off like that.

■ Josh Brown is money on a 46-yard field goal. Kickers must love domes. Seattle 3, Pittsburgh 0. Twenty-two seconds left in the first.

SECOND QUARTER

■ Jerome Bettis is in on the Steelers' fourth possession. Why did it take so long?

K-State trailed much of the first half, but solid shooting in the second half enabled the Wildcat women to build a lead and — with the help of sophomore Kimberly Dietz — keep their edge, dropping Nebraska 71-64.

Dietz's hot hand allowed K-State to stretch a tied ball game (33-33) at halftime to an early eight-point lead in the second half with one of her four 3-pointers. Her 12 second-half points also helped ensure the Cats' (16-5, 6-4 Big 12 Conference) fifth-straight win against Nebraska (12-8, 4-5).

Nebraska's Kelsey Griffin notched 28 points on the night, but junior Claire Coggins (17 points), freshman JoAnn Hamlin (10) and senior Jessica McFarland helped Dietz out, combining for 32 of the Cats' 38 second-half points.

Coach Deb Patterson said she was thrilled with her players' ability to maintain the advantage in a close situation at the end.

"I loved the way we finished," Patterson said. "Tonight, just the way we stepped up — Kimberly Dietz made great foul shots, and everybody did a great job getting the ball up the court, taking care of the basketball against pressure late in the game, and I was really pleased with our overall competitive demeanor and disposition down the stretch of that game."

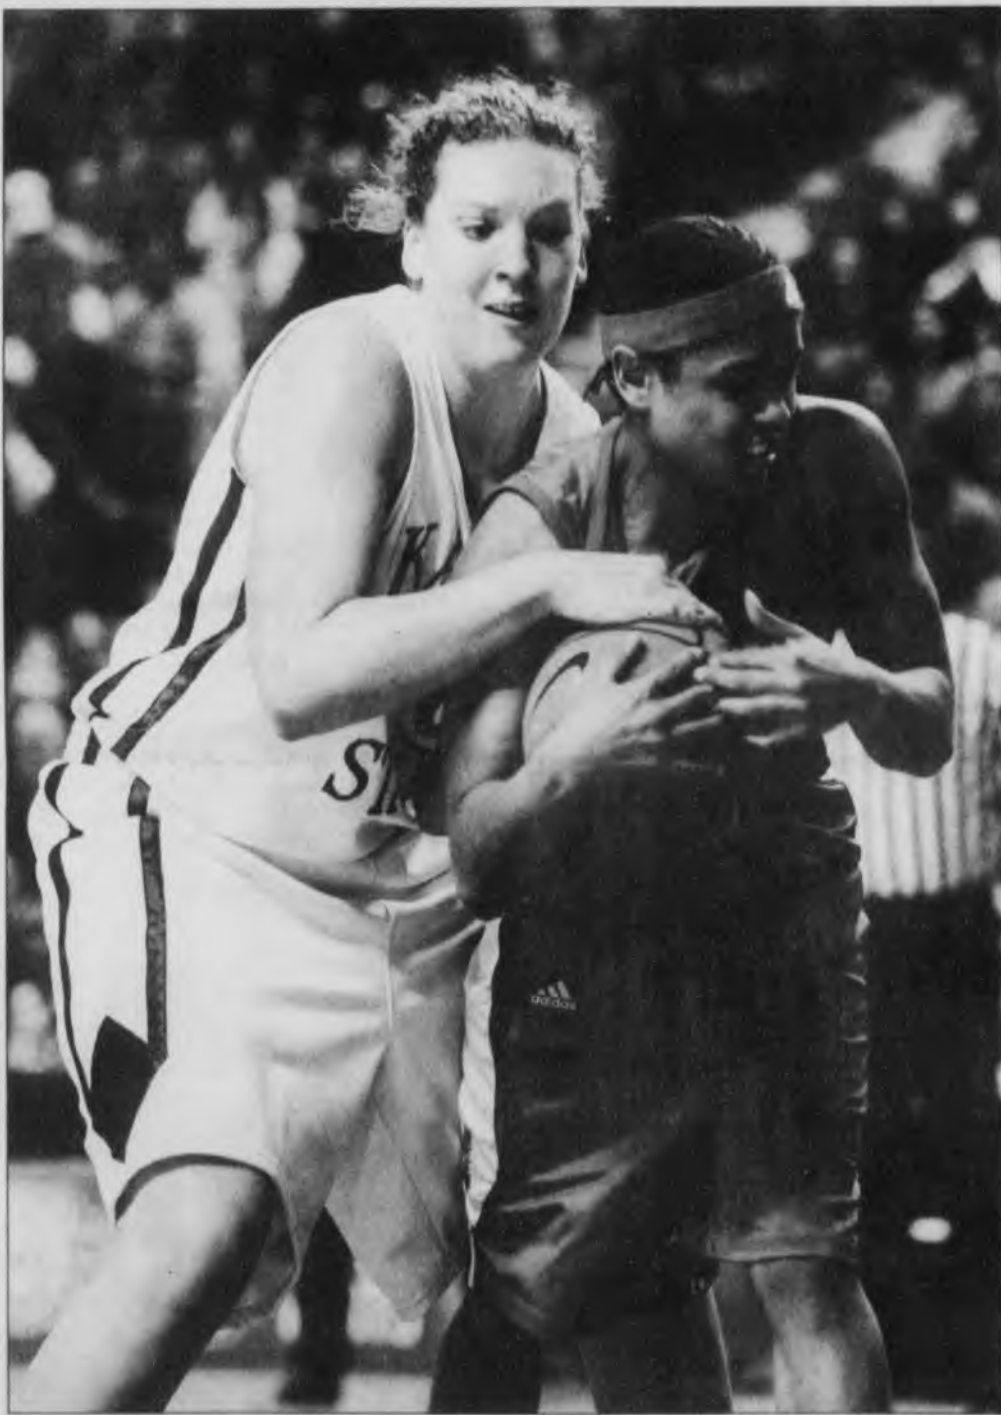

Indeed, Dietz, a 90-percent free-throw shooter, showed composure at the end, sinking four free throws in the final 23 seconds to extend K-State's 67-62 lead to seven in the waning seconds.

Despite being individually credited with closing out the game, the win was a collaborative effort, Dietz said.

"I think we all just competed hard and came together and pulled this win out," Dietz said of her team's performance.

The defense also stepped up, holding the Cornhuskers' Kiera Hardy, the Big 12's sixth-best shooter and sixth-best three-point shooter, to 0-of-11 from three-point land and 14 points for the game.

"I am really proud of the job our perimeter players did on her," Patterson said. "I think everyone did a great job of bringing attention to her."

K-State's 66-65 overtime loss to Missouri on Feb. 1 was disappointing for the Wildcats, and the players' ability to regroup and come back against the Cornhuskers is a testament to their fighting spirit, said Coggins, who, along with Hamlin, fouled out in the last 45 seconds of the game.

"We talked earlier about how we don't get negative or get down about a loss and how our players come back every day to the gym and take it so personally because they want to do so well," Coggins said. "I think that shows the heart our team has."

The fact that her team was able to respond to a tough loss is a good sign heading into the second half of conference play, Coggins said.

"I think the way that we came out fighting like we do

K-State runner sets 1,000-meter NCAA track record

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the time it took the Beach Boys to sing "Barbara Ann," Christian Smith had set a new NCAA record in the 1,000-meter run.

Smith ran a 2:19.57 at the Sevinig Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., to break a collegiate record set in 1986 by Doug Consiglio of the University of Arkansas.

"It's pretty exciting to know that I ran faster than anyone else in NCAA competition," Smith, a senior, said. "I'd say I'm pretty pleased with the run."

Along with the national record, Smith also broke his own K-State record by one second, his own venue (the Bob Devaney Sports Center) record by one second and the Husker Invitational record by six seconds.

"That was a great run," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "It was just a phenomenal effort. The time still has to be ratified to be official, but that being said, it was a great run."

Smith, a native of Garfield, Kan., said he started thinking about the Husker Invitational as his chance to set the record as early as last summer.

"I think this year, this was the race to do it," he said. "But if I was ever in a race with faster competition, I could probably go faster. There's room for improvement."

On the women's side, senior Breanna Eveland turned in a performance overshadowed only by Smith's record-breaking run. The native of Grand Rapids, Mich., reset her own K-State record in the pole vault with a jump of 14 feet, 1 1/4 inches and became the first female in Wildcat history to clear 14 feet.

"I thought she jumped very well," Rovelto said. "In any championship, that kind of performance will be very good, if not win. For her to continue to jump at that level is pretty phenomenal."

Eveland's vault moved her into sole possession of the best jump in the nation. Her previous jump of 13 feet, 11 1/4 inches tied her with Lacy Janson of Florida State.

Five Wildcats won event titles, including senior Kyle Lancaster in the high jump and sophomore Morgan Bonds in the 600-yard run.

Lancaster, a Fort Scott, Kan., native, beat three other All-Americans to win his fourth-straight title with a jump of 7 feet, 2 1/2 inches. He now has finished above seven feet in 21 of his 30 career competitions as a Wildcat.

Album review by Lauren Rohrer

"The Underpants," which opened in Nichols Theatre on Thursday night, is a gut-busting, fun evening of theater that shouldn't be missed.

"The Underpants," adapted by Steve Martin, follows the "brief" misfortune of a German woman in 1910 who causes a bit of sensation in the neighborhood when she exposes her underpants in broad daylight.

Hilarity ensues when different men enter her home with lustful thoughts after seeing her underpants. This is complicated because she is married.

Michael Wieser, sophomore in theater, gives a terrific performance as the romance- and lust-obsessed Versati. His pelvic-thrusting antics toward Louisa - played by Rebecca Morphis, sophomore in theater - scored the biggest laughs of the show.

In a comedy there has to be a clown, and Kinzie Jo Nelson, senior in theater, was just that. As Louisa's neighbor and best friend, Gertrude (Nelson) is a great foil for Louisa and pushes the story along by delightfully encouraging mischief.

Eric Voecks, sophomore in theater, has a good turn as Theo, Louisa's oblivious husband. He is a great counter to the bawdiness of the other men.

As the other two less-successful suitors, Nick Barton, senior in philosophy, and Alex Dryden, freshman in theater, have a lot of fun moments. They portray Cohen and Kilgelhoff, respectively. Each with their own neuroses, they are enjoyable to watch as they stumble over themselves. Barton has a physical quality about his performance and seems to have the ability to throw his body in any direction.

Casey Gregg, freshman in theater, has a quick but fun turn as "The King." He's enjoyable to watch, and I wish we got to see more of him.

This is a male-dominated show with a female central character, and Morphis is the true standout. She holds her own with great maturity against the craziness of the rest of the cast. There is a realism to her character that allows the audience to experience the show through her.

"The Underpants" is worth the time and money and perfect for a college audience.

Super Soaker helps loosen ear wax

Two physicians, in a December note in the Canadian Medical Association Journal, wrote glowingly of the ability of the Super Soaker Max-D 5000 squirt weapon to quickly and safely loosen severely impacted ear wax — knowledge learned from an emergency use when no standard ear-syringing equipment was available.

In fact, they wrote, since the Super Soaker holds much more water than the standard equipment, using it would actually shorten patients' office visits.

However, the Super Soaker was obviously not anticipated for medical use; its awkward design assured that patient and doctor would be drenched by excess spray.

With the nation at war and casualties mounting, some Pentagon officials believe that one way to reduce military families' stress is to teach them to laugh.

"The guiding principle is to laugh for no reason (which is) one of the reasons it works so well for military families," Scott said.

Album carries on tradition of musically gifted family

'Martha Wainwright'

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Martha Wainwright has music in her blood.

She was born to parents Loudon Wainwright III and Kate McGarrigle, both music veterans.

Wainwright is the younger sister of Rufus Wainwright, also a prolific musician. It should be no surprise that Wainwright's self-titled debut continues her family's legacy.

The selling point of "Martha Wainwright" is her extremely versatile voice.

When needed, she can sound vulnerable and run-down or sexy and cocksure — often within the span of a single track.

Her voice suits her material. The songs are those of lonely nights, broken relationships or confessional introspection.

Wainwright opens with "Far Away," a cracked nostalgia trip for old friends and lovers. "I have no children/I have no husband/I have no reason to be alive/Oh give me one," Wainwright longingly croons over a swirling piano and guitar track.

"G.P.T." picks up the pace and showcases Wainwright's deft ability to write a melody.

On the raunchy "Ball and Chain," Wainwright asks, "Why does this always happen?" hinting at her inability to resist her lover's sexual magnetism.

"These Flowers" is an aching ballad that merits Wainwright comparisons to Joni Mitchell.

The middle section of the album blurs together due to the songs' similar tempos and lack of distinct melodies. Wainwright recoups with album highlight "Bloody Mother Fing Ahole."

The song is a kiss-off to her father. She forcefully declares, "I will not pretend/I will not put on a smile/I will not say I'm all right for you/For you... whoever you are." The song is fitfully uncomfortable listening, but so powerful you can't turn away.

The remainder of the album closes strong. "The Maker" features brother Rufus, and the final song, Robert Louis Stevenson's "Wither Must I Wander," is a highly appropriate song for Wainwright and a bittersweet ending to a powerful album.

This album showcases a woman who is individualistic and talented. Her album recalls memorable experiences in life.

"Martha Wainwright" is the record to have spinning while on your fifth whiskey sour, reminiscing of those loved, lost and long gone.

TODAY National Lame Duck Day

Hey, today is everything it's quacked up to be. Lame Duck Day is set aside to give recognition to people whose tenure in a position is running out.

Ok, so you probably are thinking that a "lame duck" is a duck with some sort of injury. If only that were the reason for today! Rather, a "Lame Duck" by human definition is a person who is in a position of some kind, and will soon be "shown the door."

Today, if you are a Lame Duck: Enjoy those final days. Reflect upon your successes, and the joys and rewards the position provided you. Kick back a little and have some fun today and in the remaining days.

If you know a Lame Duck: Supporters should provide recognition and support. Non-supporters can cut the Lame Duck a little slack today. They will soon be gone.

If you are a duck and you are lame, seek medical attention.

One can only ask, "why?"

There are a lot of bizarre days. Many celebrate funny or silly or strange events. But we wonder why someone would want to celebrate a toothache? Unfortunately, we have yet to uncover a Web site or any written documentation about this day.

We suggest you participate in this day by learning or reviewing the cause of toothache and tooth decay.

FRIDAY 1958: Elvis tops charts

Elvis Presley's ballad "Don't" becomes his ninth No. 1 single since "Heartbreak Hotel" first topped the charts in 1956. He recorded "Don't" in September while cutting his first Christmas album. Elvis Presley would achieve a record-breaking 17 top singles. To this day, he remains second only to the Beatles in number of chart toppers.

Drum program encourages freedom of expression

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 20 children, parents and students played bongos, finger cymbals and other percussion instruments at a community drum circle Friday night at Roosevelt Elementary School.

Richard Pitts, director of the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum, started the community drum circles five years ago in Manhattan.

He said he does not require any previous experience for his drum circles, and the drums are provided.

There is nothing right or wrong about one's drumming since music is spiritual, Pitts said.

"Anyone can play the drum because each and every one of us has a rhythm," he said.

Josh Runyan, sophomore in elementary education, said he plays the drums for recreation and has known Pitts since childhood when he attended the Wonder Workshop.

Runyan said he enjoys drum circles because one part of the circle can play a loud beat, but another part can take the lead at any time.

"Drum circles open up the spirit, and you are free to do anything," Runyan said.

Pitts also started the drumming ensemble Roots of Rhythm about three years ago as a means of promoting African-American culture. The group is comprised of about 10 people who meet on Wednesday nights to share African rhythms and positive drumming energies, he said.

Pitts said music is a part of every celebration and event in Africa.

"There is nothing that goes by without music, because it is sensual and it is culture," he said. "Early rhythms are still a part of our music today."

Pitts said he has been playing hand drums since he was a teenager in New Jersey.

"When you get connected to the music, it makes you want to play," he said.

As a child, Pitts said he was fascinated with trains and tried to imitate them.

and one bass beat, the drum circle imitated the sound of a train. Pitts directed the circle to speed up and slow down, and even yelled "choo choo" during the song.

Pitts lowered himself to the ground when the circle was to quiet down, and raised his arms when the music was to get louder.

While the drumming was freelance, Pitts counted to three when the songs were to end, and jumped in the air on the last beat.

Carmen Caffey, sophomore at Lawrence High School in Lawrence, said she has been playing drums since sixth grade, and is on drum line and in band at school.

Caffey used to attend the Wonder Workshop, and came to the drum circle since she was in town Friday night.

Drum circles are important because they encompass community involvement, Caffey said.

"Everyone plays one big rhythm," she said. "It's kind of cool."

Teresa Minton, Manhattan resident, has attended Pitts' drum circles before with her family. She even made her own drum out of a cowhide in 2003.

"We like to play our own drums whenever we get a chance," Minton said.

Zach Almquist, fifth-grader at Marlatt School, played the bass and congo drums during the drum circle.

Almquist said he is in his school's band and has liked drums since about age 7.

"I attended the drum circle because I wanted to see the different types of drums," he said. "Most of the drums here I have never seen before."

Pitts said he has community drum circles once or twice a year to allow community members to get to know one another.

"When you're having fun and you're relaxed, it's easy to get to know someone," he said. "Everyone has a rhythm, and I play off that rhythm."

Group spreads appreciation of Buddhist religion

Mariko Price, graduate student in curriculum and instruction, laughs during the K-State Buddhist Association meeting Feb. 2 in the K-State Student Union. The group will meet again at 5:30 p.m. Feb. 16 in the Union.

The K-State Buddhist Association is a small but growing student organization.

The group, established last October, has members who said they try to appreciate and reflect on the Buddhist doctrine through the study and practice of Buddhism.

"There are so many churches in Manhattan but no place where I could pursue my spiritual practice of Buddhism," said Mariko Price, graduate student in curriculum and instruction and group founder and president.

Price, a native of Japan, said she wanted to set up an organization where local Buddhists could gather regardless of their denominations and discuss spiritual and religious issues.

"Essentially, I was looking at setting up a group which would foster ecumenical thinking, nurture Buddhist spirit and encourage people to express their perspectives and ideas on various topics," Price said.

The group, which began as a member of the committee on religion, was set up with the assistance of Donald Fallon, coordinator of religious activities in the Office of Student Life.

Fallon listed reasons for the importance of such an organization on campus.

"It helps people of Buddhist faith to carry on their private meditation and spiritual development," he said. "It also provides the group a sense of community and finally, it exposes Americans to Buddhism, which is a world religion."

The association has about 20 members from Japan, Korea, India, Brazil and the United States. The organization is open to K-State students, faculty and staff, as well as Manhattan residents.

The group has bi-weekly meetings in the K-State Student Union during which members from various denominations meet and express their opinions on subjects like happiness, karma, anger and meditation.

This week, members discussed excerpts from the book, "The Art of Happiness," authored by the 14th Dalai Lama and Howard C. Cutler. The book has citations from the Buddhist doctrine with advice that is accessible even to those unfamiliar with Buddhism.

Christina Hauck, associate professor of English, serves as the faculty adviser for the organization.

Hauck said goodness and kindness exist in all human beings. She made a reference to the concept of causation and how one good deed leads to another.

"Infants come into the world as little bundles of demands, and as we grow up we crave for love and support," she said. "When we are loved, we readily share it with people."

The discussion also centered on readings from the book, which discusses how human nature is essentially compassionate and gentle. Members said they believe characteristics like anger, violence and aggression are superficial and not part of the underlying nature.

Richard Marston, professor in the Department of Geography, broached the topic about the state of happiness in human beings being governed by external factors. He also talked about mental discipline.

"We cannot prevent emotions like anger and resentment, as they are but human," Marston said. "But when such feelings plague you, stop and don't let them overpower you.

Empty your mind and let go."

Another member, Marina Pecar, assistant professor in the College of Architecture Planning and Design, spoke about the transience of negative emotions.

"Emotions aren't real," she said. "Put them in the sun, in the rain and in the wind and they'll fade away. Time is a healer."

Members discussed different remedies for anger and stress. Price said every time she gets angry, she tries to get down to basics and find out what caused the anger. Hauck also discussed how meditation slowly helps diffuse agitation.

The group has many plans for the semester.

Besides its bi-weekly meetings, which begin with meditation and chanting of mantras – sacred verbal formulas repeated in prayer – Price said she hopes to organize a joint meeting with the Buddhist group from the University of Kansas.

The group also plans to have a lecture series by Buddhist leaders from surrounding cities and prayer sessions with sand mandalas – ritualistic geometric designs symbolic of the universe that are used in Buddhism as an aid to meditation – by Buddhist monks.

The next meeting is scheduled for 5:30 p.m. Feb. 16 in the Union.

Manhattan 24/7 campaign receives 3 awards

Commercials made to attract consumers win Best of Show Broadcast Television ADDY

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan 24/7 Advertising Campaign received three of the Topeka Advertising Federation's ADDY awards Jan. 28.

Campaign creators Kristin Brighton, owner of BrightWard Communications, Inc. and Susan Religa, owner of Susan Religa Marketing Services, received the Advertising Federation's 2006 ADDY Competition Best of Show Broadcast Television Award for the series of three commercials they produced.

Brighton and Religa also were honored with a silver ADDY for the overall 24/7 campaign and a silver ADDY for the "Treat Yourself" commercial used in the campaign.

The ADDYs are the advertising industry's largest and most representative competition. The competition attracts more than 60,000 entries every year in local competition, and more than 270 entries were judged as part of the Topeka competition.

The mission of the ADDY Awards is to recognize and reward creative excellence in the art of advertising.

Brighton and Religa received letters explaining they had won awards in three different categories but were unaware of what those categories were.

"We just had no idea that we would win best in show," Religa said. "That was a complete surprise and shock."

The campaign, which was launched last October, featured a rotation of newspaper and radio advertisements, television commercials and direct-mail postcards, Religa said.

The campaign targeted people living within a 60-mile radius of Manhattan, and it was funded by the city of Manhattan, the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and sponsor businesses.

"The campaign was made to bring customers in from out of town with the idea that there is something always going on in Manhattan," Religa said.

John LaBarge, owner of J&C Imaging, Inc., said he was impressed and pleased with the final products of the campaign.

"The campaign brought a whole new advertising look for Manhattan," said La Barge, who did the still photography for the campaign. "I was really impressed, it came around very well and I just hope people in Manhattan get the gist of what we are trying to do."

More than 70 Manhattan residents volunteered their time to help out with one of the commercials in the campaign, which featured the Manhattan Arts Center.

"It was pretty amazing to see how many people volunteered their time to support Manhattan and the Arts Center," Brighton said.

For more information
www.manhattan247.org

Brighton and Religa concluded production of the commercials with a scene on the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area.

"One of my favorite parts of the campaign was the shot out on the Konza Prairie with the piano," Brighton said. "It was just a really beautiful scene and it was the last thing we shot so it was a great conclusion."

The campaign is scheduled to run through June, and Religa said she hopes they can continue with the campaign in the future.

"We really hope to receive more funding so we can keep the campaign going," she said.

GlobalFlyer to take off Tuesday

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Virgin Atlantic GlobalFlyer is tentatively scheduled to take off early Tuesday morning for another world record attempt, according to www.globalflyer.com.

Three K-State-Salina students are helping millionaire pilot Steve Fossett with the "Ultimate Flight," an attempt to set the aviation record for longest distance traveled. Fossett will take off from the Kennedy Space Center in Florida and fly 26,000 miles in about 80 hours before landing at Kent International Airport in England.

Patrick Rinearson and Nancy Milleret, seniors in professional pilot, will assist Fossett in mission control, based in Crawley, England, about one hour south of London.

Jim Reed, senior in aviation maintenance, will help with the maintenance of the GlobalFlyer until takeoff. He also will help with post-flight recovery in England.

Milleret, Reed and Rinearson were selected to help with the "Ultimate Flight" because of their previous experience working with Fossett. In March 2005, they were part of the 11 students who helped with the GlobalFlyer flight in Salina where Fossett set the record as the first person to fly solo nonstop around the world without refueling.

The GlobalFlyer is scheduled to take off at 6:42 a.m., according to its Web site. There is a risk that the flight could be postponed if a front bringing rain and warm temperatures arrives before takeoff.

Topeka man guilty following 2nd trial

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALINA — A Topeka man has been convicted a second time of murdering a woman and her 13-month-old son in an Emporia apartment explosion in July 2001.

Jurors on Friday in Salina convicted Wallace L. Dixon III, 35, of two counts of felony murder. Dana Hudson, 19, and her son, Gabriel, were killed in the fire after an explosion in an adjacent apartment in the Eastgate Plaza complex.

Dixon was convicted of the same charges in Lyon County District Court in May 2002. He won a new trial last June when the Kansas Supreme Court found prosecutorial errors in the original trial.

Dixon's new trial was set for Lyon County. But Chief Judge Merlin Wheeler in December ordered the trial moved. It was reassigned to Saline County District Court with Lyon County officials traveling there.

The case with a Saline

County jury began Jan. 23 before Wheeler. As in the original trial, Lyon County Attorney Marc Goodman shared prosecutorial duties with two lawyers from the Kansas Attorney General's office. On Friday, Goodman said the jury spent about eight hours deliberating the case and brought back a verdict at about 1:30 p.m.

Jurors found Dixon guilty of two counts each of felony first-degree murder, aggravated battery and burglary and single counts of felony criminal damage to property and misdemeanor theft. The jury acquitted on additional charges of aggravated arson, aggravated assault and two counts of aggravated battery.

Dixon was scheduled to be sentenced in Lyon County District Court on April 24. In June 2002, Wheeler sentenced Dixon to two life terms with no possibility of parole for 20 years for the murder convictions. The sentences were ordered to run consecutively.

talk with. It is important that students do research and feel comfortable talking to employers."

Robl said it would be a good idea to register on the CES Web site and bring plenty of résumés.

"Try to register with CES before the career fair," Robl said. "Many companies are here to meet potential candidates for positions that are, and will be, available through CES. Many companies will ask for your resume, then tell you to apply through CES."

With so many employers attending the fair, Nordhus said it speaks highly of K-State and its students.

"It says that K-State engineers are on demand," she said.

"Industries recognize that Kansas State University's College of Engineering produces students with high-quality people skills, strong work ethic, superior team skills, proficiency with the latest technology and experience in solving technical problems."

The fair runs from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the College of Engineering complex atrium.

MENS | Future uncertain for Cats

The Wildcats had the 56-47 advantage with five minutes left in the game, but two 3-pointers from Jamaal Brown ignited a 17-6 Cowboy run that whittled K-State's nine-point padding to seal the victory for Oklahoma State.

The Cats shot 39.6 percent (19-48) from the field and committed 17 turnovers, but Wooldridge said his team's decline is because of a lack of drive.

"You've seen exactly what has happened and where we are today," Wooldridge said. "We built the momentum, and now it's the opposite - obviously, we don't have any momentum going."

Harris applied some momentum Saturday, contributing 14 points on 6-of-12 shooting to the offense, while Martin had a rare eight-point, 2-of-10 shooting outing.

"I just think he struggled from the very beginning," Wooldridge said of Martin. "We gotta have the leading scorers doing just that. I need to look and see where he struggled and why he struggled."

In two weeks, K-State has plummeted from a three-way second-place tie in the Big 12 to a tie with the Cowboys for fifth. The Wildcats still have to travel to Missouri, Texas Tech, Oklahoma and Nebraska, and the road has been an obstacle course for the Cats this year.

Now where do the Wildcats go from here? After the game, neither Wooldridge nor Harris had answers.

"Everybody's down. We really don't know what to think," Harris said. "We're kind of frustrated, we know we were supposed to win that game."

Muslim countries," Al Salim said. "And this is the main point why Muslims protest."

Strong responses also came from the local Muslim community. Ebrahim Merza, secretary of the Muslim Student Association, said the caricatures meant more than humor and drawings to the Muslim world.

"In Islam, we believe all prophets are chosen by the God," he said. "No single person can mock or make fun of them, they have to be paid full respect."

Merza said the cartoons hurt people and solve nothing.

"If you don't like them, don't make fun of them," he said.

Merza said of the focus the war on terror should be aimed at how to avoid terror and boost the understanding of different religions.

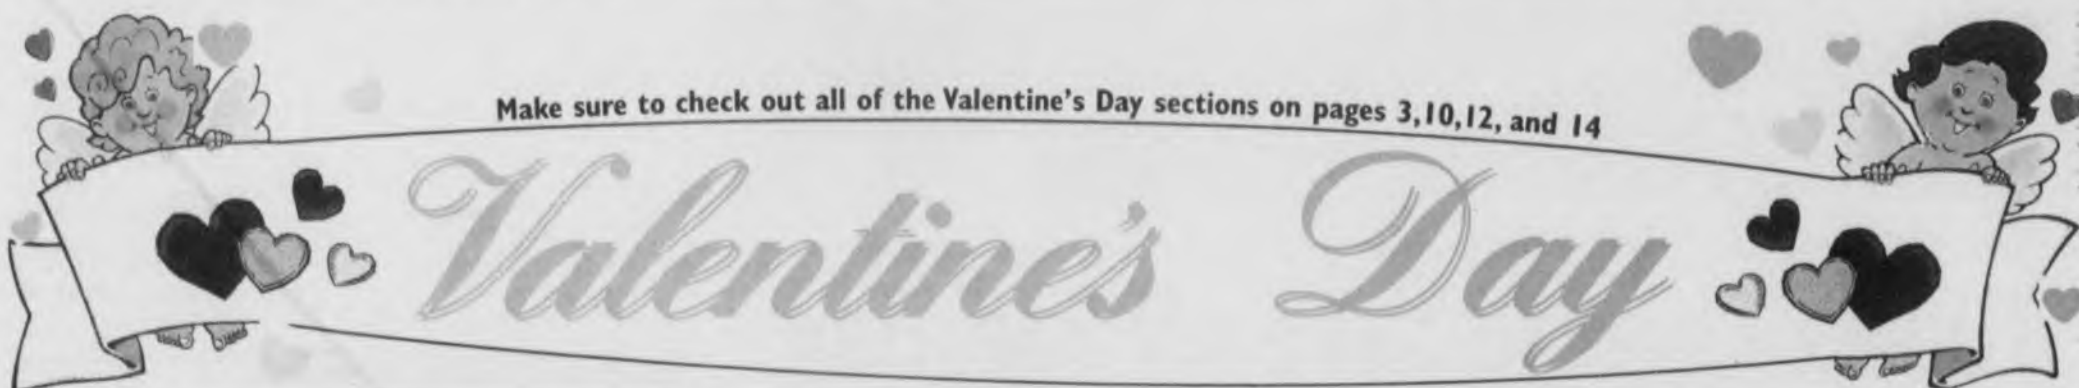

Patrick Akard, assistant professor in the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work, said he agreed.

Akard said the first step should aim to continue the dialogue, because misunderstandings lead to conflict, and that both sides should strive to understand one another.

"The West is insensitive to the Muslim world, and there is not a lot of openness toward broad prospectiveness," he said. "This is a trick issue. The problem left conflict and frustrations."

is nearly impossible.

"We certainly don't live in a sterile world," Murphy said.

Students should stay at home if they catch the flu to keep from spreading the virus, said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center.

Close contact is how the virus is spread, Kennedy said, so washing hands in hot water with soap is a way to keep healthy.

"Biggest thing is to wash your hands," she said. "It's the easiest thing, but it's the biggest thing."

Kennedy said she thought the ease of travel in today's world might increase the transmission of viruses and diseases and make an outbreak or epidemic more likely.

"I can be in Kansas today, and I can be on the other side of the world tomorrow," Kennedy said. "Something on the other side of the world can be here."

Because of this global community, Kennedy said researchers and scientists have suggested a worldwide epidemic, known as a pandemic, is more probable.

"Experts are saying, yes, we could have a major outbreak, but we don't know when it could occur," Kennedy said.

Although the reality of such an outbreak could cause major concern for public health, Kennedy said she would not want people to feel paralyzed by fear of future events.

"Am I worried when I go out the door that I'm going to get something? No, not yet," Kennedy said.

Erica Hutfless, senior in microbiology, said she works in a research laboratory analyzing the baculovirus, DNA-containing viruses in a cell's nucleus. Hutfless said working at the lab has allowed her to hear about the concerns and research about viruses and how major diseases spread.

"We get to talk about where it's coming from, why it could be so deadly and if it jumps to the next stage," she said.

Hutfless said anxiety happens, but people should not sit around and worry about the future.

"If you worry about it, it'll just make you sick," she said. "You just don't sit there agonizing. You just have to keep things in perspective."

Pittsburgh finally picks up a first down.

■ Something could be seriously wrong with Antwaan Randle El's back. That was a vicious hit.

■ Wow, Randle El is back in. S-T-U-D.

■ Hines Ward makes an unreal catch at the three-yard line. Pittsburgh finally has some offensive mojo.

■ Is Bettis really going to get stuffed at the goal line three times in a row?

■ Nope, because Roethlisberger going to run it in behind Bettis.

■ Wait. Did he get in?

■ Yes, he did. Steelers 7, Seattle 3. 1:55 left in the half.

■ One player I haven't talked about much is Seattle running back Shaun Alexander. He has been quiet so far, and he's supposed to be the MVP of the NFL.

■ Brown misses a field goal with two seconds left. Maybe not all kickers love domes.

■ Halftime: Pittsburgh 7, Seattle 3.

HALFTIME

■ That's crazy. My cell phone has crime deterrent, too.

■ When did the Rolling Stones get de-mummified? What's that? They aren't dead yet? Could've fooled me.

■ Mick Jagger must have strong calves because he walks around on his tiptoes.

■ Keys to the second half: For the Steelers, they need to get a running game established to take some pressure off young Roethlisberger to make so many plays. For the Seahawks, they need to get back to the quick-hitting offense that gave them some success early in the game.

THIRD QUARTER

■ Pittsburgh's Willie Parker goes for 75 yards and the TD. Ladies and gentlemen, Parker is fast. And just like that, the Steelers have a wave of momentum. Steelers 14, Seahawks 3. 14:38 in the third.

■ If Seattle wants to get back in this, it needs a big drive to answer Pittsburgh's touchdown. Otherwise, the Steelers will start running and blitzing like crazy.

■ Congrats to Parker for breaking Marcus Allen's longest Super Bowl run record.

■ Alexander breaks his first big run of the night. He looked like an MVP there.

■ Brown with another field goal miss for Seattle, this time from 50 yards out. I bet Brown hates the Ford Field dome right about now.

■ Two huge catches by Hines Ward had the Steelers on the move again.

■ That commercial for the Hummer H3 is the worst so far.

■ That interception by Seattle's Kelly Herndon was ridiculously big for the Seahawks. What a mistake by Roethlisberger.

■ Jerramy Stevens makes the 16-yard touchdown catch, and Seattle gets some desperately-needed momentum. Pittsburgh 14, Seattle 10. 6:45 left in the third.

■ On a side note, Seattle's neon green gloves are hideous.

■ This is an impressive drive by Seattle just for the fact that it started with horrible field position.

FOURTH QUARTER

■ Taylor redeems himself for the earlier whiff with a monstrous interception on a Seattle drive. Momentum, meet the Pittsburgh Steelers, again.

■ There is Pittsburgh's gadget play, and man does it work like clockwork. Randle El to Ward on a reverse pass. Money. Pittsburgh 21, Seattle 10. 8:56 left in the game.

■ Seattle quarterback Matt Hasselbeck fumbles.

■ Replay shows he was down by contact. This will get reversed.

■ Call reversed. Hasselbeck is lucky.

■ Randle El picks up a first down on a dump pass, and he is my early pick for Super Bowl MVP.

■ First down run by Roethlisberger, and I'll say it now, that's ballgame folks.

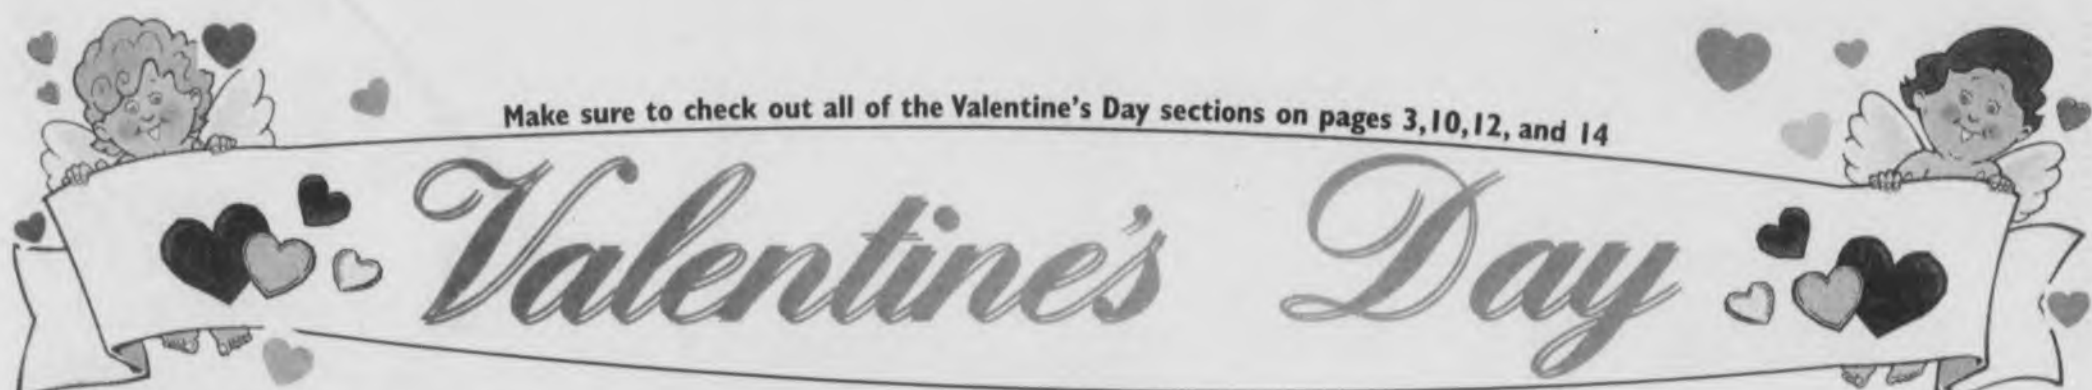

■ Sixty seconds left. Start celebrating Steel Town.

■ Seattle's playcalling at the end of both halves has been atrocious.

■ Game over. Pittsburgh 21, Seattle 10. It wasn't the most memorable Super Bowl, but congrats to Roethlisberger and Steelers' coach Bill Cowher, who each pick up their first Super Bowl win.

Sam Goody to close after filing Chapter 11

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sam Goody, a music and movie retail store, is closing in Manhattan Town Center, Third Street and Poyntz Avenue.

Sara Van Allen, marketing manager for Manhattan Town Center, said the store's closing is the result of a corporate bankruptcy. An exact closing date has not been set, but the store is having a 20-percent storewide liquidation sale, Van Allen said.

"Sam Goody is at a great location that leads right down to the restroom, so we will be actively trying to fill that space as soon as possible," Van Allen said.

Summer Caldwell, store manager of Sam Goody, said she was unable to comment on the store's closing.

According to a Feb. 1 Citybizlist article, Musicland Holding Corp., which operates Sam Goody, announced an intention to close 341 of its underperforming and unprofitable stores as part of its Chapter 11 financial review.

Despite its store closing, customers can continue to shop online at www.samgoody.com.

Corey Mayes, junior in wildlife biology, said she has enjoyed shopping at Sam Goody. Mayes said stores, such as Hastings Books Music & Videos, do not always have the best selection in music since they specialize in other items.

"It might be hard to find things at other stores since there aren't that many stores in Manhattan that specialize in just music," she said.

Wooldridge to undergo neck surgery

By Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State men's basketball head coach Jim Wooldridge is scheduled to undergo surgery on Wednesday to remove a bulging disk in his neck, according to a press release from K-State Sports Information.

The Wildcats face Iowa State Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum, however, Wooldridge will be unable to coach after his surgery. In his absence, assistant coach Jimmy Elgas will lead the Wildcats against the Cyclones.

"I have been suffering with this condition for much of the season, and it has become more acute over the past 10 days," Wooldridge said in the release. "The doctors have informed me that without immediate attention that this condition will only become more serious and permanent. I hate to step away from the team at such a critical juncture of the season, but I believe that I have to take measures now to correct these health issues."

After undergoing tests, it was discovered Wooldridge was suffering from a vertebrae protrusion in his neck, which was causing numbness in his extremities.

It is not known when Wooldridge will return to coaching. The release stated his return would be dictated by his recovery speed and when he gets clearance from his physician.

Living with diabetes

Health experts, diabetics stress importance of diet, blood testing

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new inhalable version of insulin could change the way many diabetics control their disease.

According to the Associated Press, an insulin inhaler that will be marketed as Exubera was approved by the Food and Drug Administration last month. The group's decision was announced after a three-month delay used for additional research into the drug's chemical data.

Clinical trials found the drug to be just as effective in managing blood sugar as injected insulin, offering an alternative treatment to insulin injections in order to regulate blood sugar.

The inhaler is just one of a number of treatment options available to more than 14 million Americans who have been diagnosed with either Type 1 or Type 2 diabetes. The disease has no cure, which leaves each diabetic to establish a personalized treatment plan with the aid of medical professionals.

Dane Schmidt, junior in pre-professional elementary education, said he was diagnosed with diabetes on Valentine's Day when he was 13 years old. Struck by what they thought to be a bad case of the flu, Schmidt said his parents drove him to the hospital to get him checked out.

Doctors tested his blood sugar. An ideal blood sugar level is 100. Schmidt tested at 1600, more than 10 times the normal level. The doctors diagnosed him with Type 1 diabetes.

"The day I got the diagnosis. I was surprised. I thought, 'I'm going to be a diabetic forever,'" Schmidt said.

He said he went on to learn that Type 1 diabetes was caused by his pancreas' inability to secrete insulin. Doctors told Schmidt that a carefully balanced diet, frequent blood tests and insulin injections were the key to controlling his disease.

Michelle Netson, registered dietician at Derby Dining Center, said detailed planning of daily meals is an important factor in monitoring diabetes.

Deadline for changing eID passwords is Wednesday

By Michlynn Rose
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The spring 2006 deadline to change eID passwords is Wednesday.

"Twenty-five thousand plus e-mail notices were sent out on February 1 to people who still needed to change their passwords," said Rebecca Gould, director of Information Technology Assistant Center.

According to the K-State Information Technology Web site, the changing of a K-State password took effect in the summer of 1999 when an increase of K-State computer break-ins occurred.

Since then students, faculty and staff have had to change their electronic identification passwords once in the fall and again during the spring semester.

The first step in changing your eID password before the deadline is to visit the eid.k-state.edu Web site. Then sign in and select the password option. For assistance contact the IT Help Desk.

EID passwords must be six to eight characters long and can include letters, numbers, and or punctuation marks. There must be five different characters and cannot be based on computing ID or a real name; cannot contain any identifiable word, phrase, acronym, or K-State related name; and cannot be one of the four million-plus words known and used by hacker programs to break into accounts.

The IT Web site suggests using first letters of phrases you like or an obscure line from a favorite song, book, movie or poem. A password should include numbers, punctuation marks, mix uppercase and lowercase letters or reverse part of a word or phrase.

However, one should not use K-State terminology, first and last names of any K-Staters, personal numbers or codes, any known information about yourself, well-known phrases, obvious number sequences or real words when changing your eID password.

K-State policy also states that you should not share your password with others.

6 robots from Utah State patrol Super Bowl

LOGAN, Utah — While most of America gathered around television sets to watch nickel defenses and quarterback protections in Super Bowl XL, six robots developed at Utah State University were running security of their own in the parking garages outside Ford Field.

Known as ODIS, the Omni-Directional Inspection System is a 45-pound "bathroom scale" that rolls beneath cars to look for contraband or explosives, said YangQuan Chen, director of the Center for Self-Organizing and Intelligent Systems (CSOIS) at USU. "Basically, it puts the robot in harm's way," he said.

Kevin L. Moore, director of the CSOIS during the development of ODIS, said the robot used at the Super Bowl and at checkpoints in Iraq is the third generation of the robot, called the ODIS T2.

Approximately 30 USU electrical engineering students developed ODIS between 1998 and 2004 with funding from the U.S. Army, he said.

INCIDENT LEADS TO CALL FOR CHANGE

STORRS, Conn. — An incident in which three former University of Connecticut students allegedly ejaculated onto a woman in a UConn dormitory last fall has led some to call for a change in the state's sexual assault statutes.

A story first reported in the Hartford Courant stated Jared Skvirsky, 20, of Brookline, Mass.; Martin Piscottano, 19, of Somers, Conn.; and Zak Brohinsky, 19, of Simsbury, Conn.; were charged with disorderly conduct and public indecency in connection to a Sept. 24 incident.

UConn Police Maj. Ronald Blicher said the incident was reported Sept. 27. According to arrest warrant affidavits cited in the Courant story, Skvirsky brought the woman back to his dorm room after a party and they started kissing, but the woman stopped and stayed on the futon. According to the affidavits, both had been drinking but weren't drunk.

The affidavits stated Brohinsky and Piscottano returned to the room and tried to wake the woman up, but could not. The three men then watched pornography and took turns ejaculating onto the woman, according to the affidavits.

UConn Police decided to pursue disorderly conduct charges but not sexual assault charges, Blicher said in consultation with the state's attorney's office.

According to the Courant story, the men couldn't be charged with sexual assault because they did not physically touch her.

Commission to vote on improvement reserve fund

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The city of Manhattan has $1.2 million burning a hole in its pockets. The Manhattan City Commission will vote at its meeting at 7 tonight on an ordinance that would take that extra money and set it aside for future projects in a capital improvement reserve fund. Bernie Hayden, director of City Finance, said the money comes from when the city took in $1.5 million extra from tax revenue in 2004. Hayden said $300,000 was used for a tax cut the next year. He said if the rest of the money were used to lower taxes, it would drop the levy significantly.

Hayden estimated that would save each taxpayer $30 to $40, but said taxes probably would increase during the next year. Hayden said that under Kansas law, the money in the reserve fund could be used for city improvements but not for expenses like payroll. "It could be a street, it could be a park, it could be that new aquatic center they've been talking about," Hayden said. Commissioner Tom Phillips said the reserve fund was first discussed in spring 2005. Phillips said he has not been able to read the latest draft due to illness. "As long as the city is focused on using this on valid capital needs — sewers, waters, streets — I don't have a problem with it," Phillips said.

Mayor Pro-Tem Bruce Snead said putting the money in reserve should help with future projects that might become necessary due to growth in Manhattan and the influx of soldiers to Fort Riley. "It gives us some additional flexibility in our budget," Snead said. "I'm going to be looking at it favorably."

For those interested in attending the Manhattan City Commission meeting, they can go to the City Commission Room at City Hall, 1011 Poyntz Ave. A live broadcast of the meeting will also be available on Cox Cable Channel 3. For additional details about the meeting, go to the city of Manhattan Web site, www.ci.manhattan.ks.us.

Approximately 280 students from 26 Kansas high schools attended the annual meeting of the K-State Blue Key Honor Society on Monday in Forum Hall of the K-State Student Union.

This was the 18th year of the Blue Key conference, said Lauren Cox, senior in mass communications and conference coordinator.

Keynote speakers included former K-State football player, Kevin Lockett, and former football coach, Bill Snyder.

"I'm an honorary member of the Blue Key Organization, and I'm very, very proud of that," Snyder said.

Speaking to high school students, which included freshmen through seniors, Snyder stressed the need to set priorities and goals in life.

"What is it that's important to you?" Snyder asked.

He then urged the audience to define that, and said while 90 percent of people have goals, only 50 percent of people know how to achieve those goals, and only 5 percent of people actively pursue the steps to obtain the desired effect.

He said it is vital to define a plan, using steps to lead you to your goal.

"I think it's important to have a process about each and every thing that you do," he said.

Speaking about his mother, who raised him as a single parent, Snyder recalled some of her advice for the audience.

"You can accomplish anything you desire to achieve as long as you are willing to work for it," he said.

Experiences as a school teacher in Missouri and California taught him not to give in and not to give up when roadblocks present themselves, he said.

Snyder said his first teaching job was at a small town in Missouri, with 1,000 students in the school. He had studied Spanish in college and was asked to teach Spanish to several classes.

"Every day I would get ill to some degree from the stress," he said.

After leaving that job, he moved to California, near Palm Springs, to teach math and be a coach. Again, he was asked to teach Spanish for one semester while the Spanish teacher was ill.

Out of 37 students in the class, 13 spoke English.

He said he paired up the students who spoke Spanish with the ones who spoke English, and monitored the class that way, making it through the semester.

"It's a matter of perseverance," he said.

Telling the audience it is important to try and be better every single day, he used examples from popular culture to make his point.

Walt Disney failed in his first two attempts to open a film production studio and went bankrupt each time, Snyder said.

Now he is known worldwide, and left a huge successful legacy, Snyder said.

Snyder gave the audience advice he said he had always given his football players when a decision was to be made.

"If indeed I do this, will it help me be a better person?"

Former K-State football coach Bill Snyder speaks to students from various Kansas high schools Monday afternoon at Forum Hall in the Union.

he asked.

If the answer is yes, the person should do it with everything they have, and if the answer is no.

Several students attending the conference said they gained many memorable experiences attending the conference.

"The best part was meeting new people and listening to the great speakers," said Chris Heller, student at Wabaunsee High School in Alma, Kan.

Students lack skills according to study

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than half of students graduating from four-year colleges lack basic literacy skills, according to a new study.

The Pew Charitable Trusts funded a 2003 literacy study that tested college graduates on their ability to perform complex tasks such as balancing a checkbook, analyzing a news article and interpreting information from a graph or survey.

Researchers used the National Assessment of Adult Literacy to conduct their research, the same test the government uses to evaluate English literacy throughout the nation.

Students at both public and private universities were given the test. The study found that more than 50 percent of students at four-year colleges and 75 percent of students at two-year colleges do not have the literacy to complete complex tasks.

Amber Johnson, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, said she was surprised by the results of the study.

"These are definitely basic skills," she said. "The study results are almost embarrassing."

Johnson said she thought students who could not analyze a chart or summarize a survey might have a hard time finding a job after graduation.

Students' worst performance was in the mathematical section of the test. Nearly 20 percent of students had only basic quantitative skills and were unable to perform tasks including estimating gas mileage and calculating a tip at a restaurant.

LaRae Kraemer, senior vice-president at the K-State Federal Credit Union, said that while not all of her customers struggle with math, a lack of financial education has affected customers of all ages.

"It is essential that financial literacy begins at a younger age," she said. "Today's youth require the skills and knowledge of how to make responsible financial decisions, as well as the importance of developing and maintaining good credit."

Kraemer said the K-State Federal Credit Union is involved in literacy programs at area high schools to start students' financial education at an earlier age.

"We work with elementary through college-age students to develop these needed skills," she said. "The state of Kansas passed a bill, effective July 2004, which requires financial literacy be taught in all grades K-12. This regulation is a testament to the research, and more importantly, the need to provide students with this resource."

Students' inability to analyze news stories and understand the arguments presented in editorials may affect young adults not only during college, but after graduation as well.

"A lack of analytical skills could keep you from making progress in your career, and could hurt you as a citizen deciding who to vote for and which policies to support," Deborah Murray, instructor of English, said.

Murray said that although all students have academic strengths and weaknesses, the statistics presented in the literacy study seemed a little high in her experience.

"I've been teaching for 20 years, and I know it's often popular to say students today are not as smart as they were 20-30 years ago," she said.

"But I think the numbers just vary. Every student and every semester is different from the last."

V-Week events aim to raise awareness about violence

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Union Program Council is sponsoring a week of activities to raise awareness and end violence against women.

V-Week events began Monday and will continue through Saturday; they are an expansion of national V-Day campaigns. Events also will raise funds for The Ali Kemp Educational Foundation.

Ben Hopper, program adviser for the K-State Student Union, said a lot of excitement surrounded V-Week.

"It's such a worthy cause," Hopper said. "It's just really important to get the message out."

Hopper said this would be the UPC's second year being involved in V-Week. Last year's week of events was among the top five in the country, he said.

David Bulcock, co-chair of the Forums Committee, co-organizer of the event and sophomore in political science, and Zach Hauser, senior in political science, worked together to make V-Week 2006 a possibility.

Bulcock said after he heard how the events promoted a stand against violence, he wanted to be a part of it.

"Honestly, it's what V-Week stands for," Bulcock said. "It's about empowering women. We need to see violence stop."

V-Week events and activities

Today through Saturday:

■ The Clothesline Project, on display on the Ground Floor Concourse

TO THE POINT Education key to avoiding debt in adult life

The majority of Americans are in debt, and as a nation we try to place the blame for this on credit cards on mortgages.

However, a recent study shows that students are graduating from college without basic finance skills.

If we can't even balance our checkbooks, is it really a surprise that debt in our futures is almost inevitable?

The state is paying attention to this study and as a result has implemented K-12 curriculum incorporating personal finance skills.

These skills are not that hard to master. The last thing we need is a required course to add to our tuition costs.

We need to educate ourselves when it comes to our finances. Simply reading the fine print when we open accounts and not relying on misleading online banking Web sites to keep track of our balances can improve our understanding of personal finance.

We need to keep our finances in balance. Most of us have personally witnessed family members having to deal with debt. It is often a hole that only gets deeper.

We just need to avoid spending what we don't have.

After all, we will be graduating with enough pre-existing debt, and we don't need to add to it by paying unnecessary overdraft fees.

I have a secret fantasy about state of Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline.

It doesn't involve underage sex, abortion records or any of the other kinky things he's constantly yelling about.

My fantasy is that one day Kline will call a huge press conference to which every Kansan is invited.

Then, just when everyone expects him to start talking about prosecuting sexual predators or something, he'll whip out a big bullhorn and yell, "Just kidding!" and tell the whole state that his entire political career has been one big joke.

People will be surprised, but pretty soon they'll start laughing, because, if everything Kline has done as Attorney General is one elaborate prank, what a hilarious joke.

And it has to be a joke, right? Because if it's not, what exactly is he trying to do?

In June 2003, Kline issued an opinion saying that any sexual act involving a child under 16, even if it's consensual and between people of the same age, is a crime that necessarily injures the child.

And, since he interprets any sexual act involving minors as injurious, he can invoke a 1982 Kansas statute that requires medical practitioners, therapists and a variety of other folks to report any such act they have evidence of to Social and Rehabilitation Services.

Although Kline doesn't even try to hide the fact that his main objective is to obtain patient records from abortion providers, the necessary extension of his argument is that any evidence of underage sex must be reported to the authorities.

This means that minors who attempt to be responsible by obtaining treatment for sexually transmitted diseases or teen girls revealing to doctors that they've been sexually active when requesting birth control pills must be reported to the government.

I wish I were embellishing to make him look bad, but he says this flat-out in the opinion.

So, this has to be part of the joke.

Why would a responsible, elected official want to discourage teens from accessing medical treatment or birth control by forcing therapists and doctors to tattle on them?

This makes even less sense considering Kline's strong anti-abortion views. If we want to make abortion less prevalent, shouldn't we try to make reliable birth control more prevalent?

Apparently, the Kansas Supreme Court isn't in on the joke.

On Friday, it temporarily blocked Kline's access to patient records from two abortion clinics that he'd been trying to get his hands on for months, citing privacy issues. The court also nearly held Kline in contempt for his defiant attitude in the case.

The Center for Reproductive Rights, a New York advocacy group, isn't terribly amused, either. It sued Kline, saying forced reporting discouraged adolescents from being responsible about sex, invades their privacy and is generally an awful idea. The center also worries that Kline's language in the opinion is so vague that it could be interpreted as forcing kindergarten teachers to report students kissing on the playground to the government.

The suit is before a federal court.

To recap: Kline wants detailed patient records from abortion providers, he wants SRS to be notified every time teenagers have sex, and he's so riled up about all this that the state Supreme Court nearly held him in contempt. If you're confused, you're not alone.

Personally, I hope Kline really is just kidding. The attorney general pulling a prank on the state would make much more sense than trying to explain why the government needs this much information about our private lives.

Clashes between cultures will always exist

Western embassies across the Middle East crackle and burn like so much Anglo cordwood.

Mosque congregations gather angrily in the streets, European papers print and reprint the cause of the furor — a political cartoon of the Prophet Muhammed (peace be upon him) wearing a bomb-shaped turban with a fuse sticking out.

The world celebrates diversity like so much smoldering dynamite.

I suppose we could find something to blame this on — globalization or cultural insensitivity — maybe the planets were in alignment. Though few will say what many think — the Middle East is unaccepting of criticism.

From the outside it seems that the western and Middle Eastern worlds simply don't get along.

The western and Middle Eastern worlds have never gotten along, with the rare, and profitable, exception of oil.

But, the western and Asian worlds don't get along, either, nor the Asian and Middle Eastern worlds, nor the African and westerns, Middle Eastern and African, ad nauseam ad infinitum.

Goodwill is not a widely exported commodity. It seems the world would be a happier place if everyone would sequester themselves away and leave everyone else alone. But, one supposes we're too advanced to go about reasonable solutions.

I'd imagine we can blame the steam, and later, the internal combustion engine for getting us into this predicament. It used to be everyone, other than traders and explorers, largely kept within their own miserable culture.

The unfriendly world, being what it was, kept traders and explorers at a minimum, and so everyone went about their way.

Then comes the steam engine, and next thing you know everyone is chugging about, and getting in everyone else's way.

Then the internal combustion engine, making it possible to drive from Paris to Johannesburg to Beijing leaving miles of aggravated people in your wake.

Now, one can hop the nearest cigar with wings and find themselves immersed in culture and surrounded by people that see you as either obnoxious and ignorant or an easy target.

Then the great mix began.

People who once were disgruntled having to deal with people they knew and understood are forced to deal with people they don't know, don't like and generally find offensive.

We've born witness to a sort of hemorrhaging ideology, that carries some of the thought, but none of the responsibility.

For instance, much of the Middle Eastern world has long enjoyed freedom of speech. Many have warmed their hands on a blazing American flag, or the smoking remnants of an effigial U.S. President.

A practice that is fine, but where many seem to go astray is in the knowledge that freedom for you means freedom for me.

So, we're back to not getting along. The west doesn't like the Middle East because westerners believe it to be barbaric and ignorant of individual rights.

The Middle East doesn't like the west because they see it as an immoral and decadent place waging war on a faith that is important to them.

No one likes anyone; we're like too many roosters cooped up in a too little yard.

We ought to just leave each other alone because this is only going to get worse.

James Prior, Stoneybrook Assisted Living resident talks with Kimberly Beem, sophomore in pre-nursing, who also is a certified nursing assistant at Stoneybrook Assisted Living. Beem was discussing Prior's lunch choices for the following day.

Student cares for elderly residents

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Do you want hash brown potatoes or red bliss potatoes? And I have no idea what those are," a scrubs-clad Kimberly Beem asked a resident Saturday.

Beem, sophomore in pre-nursing, is a certified nursing assistant at Stoneybrook Assisted Living, where her duties include helping residents with activities of daily living (ADLs), like eating, dressing and using the bathroom.

"They (CNAs) provide direct care to the residents," Jennifer Spriggs, Stoneybrook resident services coordinator, said. "They're probably the most important part of the healthcare team."

Beem has worked at Stoneybrook for just a month, but she already knows the names and faces of 20 residents with whom she works.

She asked one woman about her band and described the "sweet" and "talkative" personalities of two others.

Beem said a lot of the residents are K-State fans, so she has a conversation opener when meeting them.

"They're good here," Ida Thomas, Stoneybrook resident, said. "They're good to all of us."

Beem works 7 a.m. to 3 p.m. Saturday and Sunday every other weekend.

She wears a scrubs top and jeans with comfortable shoes because the job keeps her on her feet all day.

Beem said a typical shift includes making beds, doing laundry and helping residents to the dining area for breakfast and lunch.

"My job basically revolves around the residents' needs," she said. "Instead of a normal job where you serve someone, I feel in this job I'm helping someone."

Beem's job as a CNA includes some paperwork. She logs how long it takes residents to eat meals for use by Stoneybrook's dietary staff, and she helps residents fill out menu choice cards for the weekend's meals.

CNAs cannot, however, dispense medication, Spriggs said.

The hardest part of the job, Beem said, is explaining to residents why they can no longer live on their own.

"This isn't exactly where people want to end up," she said.

Beem said she earned her 100-hour CNA certification from Manhattan Area Technical College about two years ago.

As a pre-nursing student, the certification will bolster her nursing school application, she said.

"It's surprising how many pre-nursing students haven't taken CNA," she said. "I don't think you can get a full grasp on the idea until you've gotten your hands in it."

"You kind of start at the lowest rung of the nursing ladder, and you get the basic experience of nursing."

The class, which costs $295, met twice weekly for three or four hours, Beem said.

The students learned how to assist patients with ADLs, worked in a laboratory setting, and did three days of clinical work.

During one of Beem's days of clinical work at Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community, she was assigned to care for an ill patient.

"That really opened my eyes to the downer side of nursing," she said.

But Beem said she has learned even more on the job than in the class.

"I've learned a lot of how to quickly problem-solve and how to have a lot of things at the same time and a lot of time-management skills," she said.

A CNA certification remains current as long as the holder works as a CNA, Spriggs said.

After one year of not working, the holder must retake the course.

Beem said her work as a CNA has increased her desire to be a nurse.

CNA tasks

- Assistance with bedpan use
- Catheter care
- Dressing, hair and nail care
- Feeding
- Post-mortem care
- Bed-making
- Tidying rooms
- Documentation
- Bathing help
- Wheelchair assistance
- Positioning
- Range-of-motion exercises
- Taking vital signs
- Answering call-lights
- Reporting changes in patients

Source: www.nursingassistantcentral.homestead.com

And, after working at Stoneybrook, she is considering specializing in geriatrics.

"I like the experience of working with people who've already lived a lot of their lives," Beem said. "I love it, and it is challenging. It teaches you to have a lot of empathy for people."

Spriggs said she also was a CNA before becoming a licensed practical nurse (LPN).

"It just taught you a lot about what was going on in the environment, and it made you want to go on and do more for them," she said.

Democrats should support solutions despite politics

Editor,

I think it's amazing that during the State of the Union speech the only time the Democrat side of the aisle decided to stand up and applaud on their own was when President Bush mentioned that his Social Security reform had not been acted upon by Congress.

The fact is: Social Security will die. That's not spin; that's a fact.

It's sad that the only thing the Democrats can do is criticize and naysay any solution that any Republican comes up with.

What I see is a Republican president coming up with a novel idea to a failed social program created by a Democrat president.

Here's my question to the left: what is your big idea? What are you doing to help the situation? What is your solution?

Maybe instead of being your old doom and gloom selves, try supporting someone in the nation who's trying to push us forward for once.

Abortion logic lacks sense when applied to other areas

Editor,

I wonder if Ms. Chapman realizes that the twisted logic she is employing is quite "irrational" and devoid of common sense.

The problem is her assertion that "If abortions ... are going to occur no matter what, wouldn't it be rational to have them occur in a safe environment ..."

By this reasoning, people are going to do drugs, so let's legalize it and provide safe meth labs for all the little druggies of the world.

Or, underage people are going to drink no matter what — those of us in college know that's a fact — so let's abolish the drinking age and provide cheap, low alcohol beer to the minors so they can be safer.

Or, we could go even further.

People are going to cheat on tests no matter what, so let's provide them with cheat-sheets and totally devoid our school of any moral integrity.

I wish she would stop blaming everyone but the guilty "mothers" who were breaking the law by having abortions before 1973.

Speaking of mothers, last time I checked, killing your child before it's born didn't qualify as "motherly" behavior.

Couple to speak about HIV responsibility

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The presentation, "A Boy, a Girl, and a Virus: the Relationship that Happened Anyway," will be made by the couple Shawn Decker and Gwenn Barringer tonight.

"The two speakers are married and one has HIV," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center. "They knew about this before but still fell in love."

Kennedy said the presentation will teach the audience about sexual responsibility.

"It will tell people to be responsible and know what the status is of their partner," she said.

Kennedy said the speech will act as a prelude for the week-long Sexual Responsibility Week, Feb. 12-18.

"They will be talking about HIV and AIDS and pretty much everything we (SHAPE) are all about," Pheasant Weber, president of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators and senior in psychology, said.

"It's to see how everyone is at risk for HIV and AIDS and how they affect people," Weber said, in regards to the main goal of the presentation.

According to www.aboyagirlavirus.com, the couple has made appearances on MTV, www.CNN.com and Cosmopolitan Magazine as well as doing their presentation on college campuses the last four years.

The speech will take place at 7 tonight in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

Strong wind plays crucial role in Wildcats' defeat at Texas Tech

Mother nature can be cruel. With winds gusting up to 40 mph, No. 61 Texas Tech (3-0, 1-0) defeated No. 67 K-State 4-3 (1-1, 0-1) on its home court in Lubbock, Texas. The Red Raiders swept the Wildcats for the doubles point before splitting, 3-3, in singles action, Sunday.

K-State women's tennis coach Steve Bietau said he expected it to be windy but that it's been difficult to practice outside with the weather so cold in Manhattan.

"The conditions were pretty windy and something we anticipated might happen," Bietau said. "It was about as extreme as it could be."

The Wildcats improved as the day progressed, however, and adapted to the harsh conditions, Bietau said.

"I was happy with how we fought back in singles," Bietau said. "That may have been an indication of adjusting, even though conditions got worse."

The strong wind made it difficult to judge how much K-State improved its fundamentals, particularly the serving, Bietau said.

"No one has a clean game in the wind," Bietau said, "especially when you talk about serves. It's difficult when the ball moves

Fan vote in All-Star game unfair, should be eliminated

Fans are what they are — fans. They will back their favorite players, no matter the situation.

It doesn't matter if they miss the game-winning shot, backstab their coach, or, for that matter, commit a crime and literally stab someone in the back.

The biggest crime these players commit, though, is accepting a ticket to an All-Star game, even though they do not deserve it.

Who is responsible for even putting the players in this situation? The responsibility lies with the fans who punch a player's election either at a game, or while sitting in front of the computer and voting for one player repeatedly on the Internet.

The only way to keep the fan favorites of teams in last place out of the premiere exhibition games is to take away the fans' right to vote.

Why is Yao Ming the leading vote-getter in the upcoming NBA All-Star game next week? The answer is because the Internet brings in the global vote.

Needless to say, Yao racked up quite a few votes in his native China, finding himself in the Western starting lineup.

Yao does have nice numbers this season, averaging nearly a double-double with 19.4 points per game and 9.4 rebounds per game.

Only one problem with the numbers — he is doing it for a losing team, and he has nearly missed half of the Rockets games this year. Houston has one of the worst records in the NBA and is buried in last place of the Western Conference, nearly 20 games out of first place.

Yet the Rockets have two players on the Western Conference roster, Yao and Tracy McGrady.

To put this in perspective, the Detroit Pistons — the best team in the league and a team that could be considered an All-Star team — does not have one of its players in the starting five of the Eastern Conference rotation.

They should get three or four players named as reserves by coaches and players, who should be choosing the entire team anyway. All this does is show how bad the fans are when it comes to choosing who belongs, basing their decision on "they used to be good or he plays for my home team."

The Pistons are on the verge of winning 70 games, something that has not been done since Michael Jordan and the Chicago Bulls did for the first time in the history of the league a decade ago.

One Piston might sneak into the starting rotation, with the injury to Indiana Pacer Jermaine O'Neal, and it will likely be Ben Wallace, but that's not enough.

Sure, Allen Iverson is averaging 33 ppg, and Dwayne Wade kept the Miami Heat afloat while Shaquille O'Neal healed his broken body. But how can you not reward the best back court in the league of Richard Hamilton and Chauncey Billups?

The fans' selections are criminal, and the NBA should change the way players are selected. Other leagues should follow suit and rid the process of the fans.

The K-State men's crew team, the Kansas State Rowing Association and Habitat for Humanity teamed up for the 10th annual Row for Humanity fundraiser from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. last Saturday at the Manhattan Town Center.

The team took donations for both the K-State Chapter of Habitat for Humanity and for themselves. A team member would row for an hour on a machine for every donation they received. Twenty percent of each donation the club received went toward the K-State Chapter of Habitat for Humanity.

Craig Doan, team coach and captain, said the event raised both money and awareness for the rowing club.

"We did this because a lot of people don't know there is a rowing club," Doan said. "We are trying to get out to the public and get everyone to know."

The club consists of 50-60 members from both the college and high school ranks. The NCAA breaks crew teams into two different groups — the highest level being NCAA and the

BWK | Public invited to honor K-State greats

K-State will honor the achievements of former Wildcat basketball greats Lon Kruger, Mike Evans and Chuckie Williams with several functions surrounding their jersey retirement Wednesday. K-State athletics officials announced Friday.

One such event the public is invited to attend is an autograph session for the three individuals from 5:15 to 6:15 p.m. on the concourse of Bramlage Coliseum. Doors to the arena will open at 5 p.m.

Kruger, Evans and Williams, who starred for the Wildcats of head coach Jack Hartman during the 1970s, will become the fourth, fifth and sixth players men's basketball players to have their jerseys retired during halftime ceremonies of the Iowa State game.

Tip-off for the game is 6:30 p.m., because of television commitments.

suspends amateur event

SYDNEY, Australia — Golfers at the New South Wales amateur championship had to deal with a different type of hazard — a stolen truck crashed on to the course, forcing play to be suspended while police chased an armed man.

The incident happened midway through Sunday's second round at Ryde-Parramatta Golf Club when a man who had allegedly held up a supermarket rammed through a fence and onto a fairway. Scattering players, he drove into a bunker before becoming stuck.

The man, brandishing a shotgun and holding a bag, then fled into a nearby unoccupied house.

As police helicopters hovered overhead and 25 police cars rushed onto the course, a two-hour siege developed before the man surrendered.

OLY | Baird is oldest Winter Olympian ever

TORINO, Italy — When American Scott Baird steps on the curling rink next week, he will become the oldest Winter Olympian in the history of the Games.

At 54 years, 282 days, the white-haired curler from Minnesota will beat the previous record set by Great Britain's James Coates, who at the 1948 Winter Games at the age of 53 and 328 days competed in the skeleton, finishing seventh.

Baird is from Bemidji, Minn., which prides itself as the curling capital of the U.S. and has another four of its citizens on the men's and women's Olympic teams. He said while he taught the younger players a thing or two about the sport, he also has picked up a lot from them.

An unpredictable delight

"The Greatest"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Chan Marshall (aka Cat Power) has always been one of indie rock's most volatile singer-songwriters. Throughout her 10-year career, the only thing that has remained constant is her unpredictability.

Marshall is known for her alcohol-fueled stage antics, her manic-depressive lyrical content and her frequent reinvention of herself from album to album; this Tennessee native's career has always been a compelling one to follow.

"The Greatest" is Marshall's seventh — and most mature-sounding — album to date. Where once her songs contained stark instrumentation and dark musings on heartache and despair that could suffocate the listener, "The Greatest" finds Marshall enlist the help of some of the best soul-musicians from Memphis, Tenn., to allow her usually dark arrangements room to breathe.

Among them is drummer Steve Potts — of Booker T. and the MG's — along with guitarist Mabon "Teenie" Hodges, and bassist Leroy "Flick" Hodges from Al Green's Capitol records backing band.

It is an album along the lines of "Dusty (Springfield) in Memphis." This time, however, the stunning British diva attempting to reinvent her sound is replaced by a Southern-fried starlet returning home and rediscovering the country, soul and blues music to which she grew up listening.

It could easily have been an album filled with boring and uninspired genre exercises, but Marshall is too good of a musician to allow "The Greatest" to devolve into tedium. The session musicians help push Marshall to examine new textures and sounds while reigning in some of her more off-putting tendencies.

Marshall's backing band creates a beautifully restrained sound that wraps her piano and vocals — which could be best described as a combination of Joni Mitchell's voice meeting sandpaper and Dido after downing a fifth of Jack Daniels and smoking a pack of Camel cigarettes — in a blanket of a more accessible sound.

To see this gorgeous musical interplay, one needs look no further than the opening title-track. Marshall's purr is surrounded by a gentle drum rhythm and strings that echo those from "Moon River." These embellishments help the track swell and fall with a beautiful sense of passion and intimacy. Many adjectives could be used to describe Marshall's songs, but until now, "warm" was not one

"Living Proof" is a toe-tapping gospel-country-tinged number. "Lived in Bars" is a song of beautiful melancholy; the track's highlight is the double-time ending that flows into a gentle coda of piano and muted trumpet.

"Could We" could almost be described as cheery; it rides along on soulful horns and a charming, easy-going drum lilt over which Marshall sings of spending time with a lover.

"The Greatest" doesn't fully forgo the darkness of earlier Cat Power records however. "After It All" is a song about an abusive relationship deceptively wrapped in honky-tonk piano and sweet whistling.

"Hate" could have been taken from 2003's brilliant "You Are Free." It is a minimalist number where deliberately strummed guitar and tense piano chords are the only thing supporting Marshall's ruminations. The tension throughout the song is almost unbearable as Marshall unblinkingly states, "I hate myself and I want to die."

The dark final third is redeemed by the album's final and best track, "Love and Communication." It chugs along on an insistent beat where Hodges and Marshall trade guitar and keyboard lines back and forth over a deep groove formed by the bass and string section.

The lyrics are a mature reflection on relationships and the (mis)communication often associated with them.

"The Greatest" finds Marshall taking her Cat Power persona in new and interesting directions. It is encouraging to find an artist who has been around for so long still pushing her comfort zone and writing inspired music. "The Greatest" might not be Cat Power's greatest album (for my money I'd go with "Moon Pix" or "You Are Free") but it certainly is a contender.

Video game offers Western shootouts but lacks story

By Brian Thoman
DAILY ILLINOIS (U. ILLINOIS)

(U-WIRE) CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — The Old West: A coarse and gruesome place in time. At least that's how it is depicted in Activision's newest action-adventure game, "Gun." The developer, Neversoft, of the famed "Tony Hawk" series, took a major 180 when making this game.

"Gun" tells the story of Colton White, a man hardened by growing up as a hunter on the Ol' Mississipp' with his father Ned, expertly voice-acted by Kris Kristofferson.

The game opens with a basic tutorial level in which you shoot game and fight wolves.

A normal transaction of fur trade with a steamboat ends in disaster when a creepy preacher kills a saloon girl. The preacher then orders an army of white savages to attack the boat in order to capture a hidden relic.

Colton is left passed out on a beach with only the guns on his hips and the burning desire of revenge. After that you'd better hold on to your saddle, partner — the rest of this game is in a hurry.

"Gun" is a solid third-person shooter with little to no flaws in the combat system, save the fact that at points it becomes unnecessarily gruesome.

I'm used to the Spaghetti Westerns where a man gets shot and falls over clutching his gut uttering his death cry, but in "Gun" the game seemed as if it was just being violent for the sake of violence. In addition to the simple gut shot, there also was dismemberment, scalping and head explosions depending on the weapon used and the area shot. Parts of this game just seemed too gory for no reason.

However, the "quick draw" system of slowing down time after you draw your trusty six-shooter enabled for very interesting shootouts; bursting into a room and sending six bandits to boot hill while they still reach for their guns, to shooting incoming arrows out of the sky.

The horse combat was satisfactory. A beginner could pick up how to ride and shoot from his horse very quickly and easily.

One problem is that horses are not that special in this game. All the horses are exactly the same except for color pattern. A player also can find one anywhere and simply take it without any consequences.

In the West, a cowboy was only as good as his horse. Colton should have had a trusty steed to see him through his adventures, not numerous unimportant animals.

However, where this game excels in gameplay, it falls short on story. While the plot itself is interesting and intriguing, it's far too short.

At one point in the game Colton becomes the deputy of a large town, easily a place for the developers to throw in a couple of missions to lengthen the game. Instead, one mission later, you've shot your deputies for murdering a harmless farm family and are going back to the city to throw your badge in the crooked mayor's face.

The whole plot feels horribly rushed and, consequently, the game play is incredibly short. Players can easily beat the game in one sitting. There are side missions, but they are repetitive shootouts that end quickly, adding very little to the game.

While "Gun" supports a large world to roam, there is little incentive to explore. No secret areas or missions are awarded to the adventurous explorer, only countless empty fields. The poor replay value offers nothing new or exciting for the repeat player.

With all its downsides, "Gun" is still a fun game to play. Its fast pace and gripping combat system will leave you wishing you lived in a time where your best friend was the iron at your side.

While "Gun" does not make a smart purchase, it is an excellent rental. So, saddle up cowboy, there are bandits afoot.

Group to sell condom roses to encourage sexual safety

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the third consecutive year, the Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators (SHAPE) are helping K-State students celebrate Valentine's Day in a safe manner.

SHAPE will sell condom roses from 10:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Wednesday and Thursday outside of the Union Food Court.

The group also will sell at the same time and place Feb. 13 and 14. The condom roses are $2 for one, and $5 for three, Pheasant Weber, SHAPE President and senior in psychology, said.

"We're also selling our 'Protect your Willy' T-shirts for $13," she said.

This will be one of the first events sponsored by SHAPE for Sexual Responsibility Week, which will be Feb. 13-19.

"The rose shape (for the condom roses) is partly in honor of that, and because of Valentine's Day, of course," Katie Kuhlman, senior in biology, said. "Our goal is to create awareness about SHAPE, and it's a way to promote safe sex in a light-hearted, kind of funny way."

According to the SHAPE Web site, activities for Sexual Responsibility Week also include a SHAPE Review session at 7:30 p.m. Monday in Union Station, and the Battle of the Sexperts at 8 p.m. Feb. 16 in the Union Courtyard.

Kuhlman said one reason students might want to buy a condom rose would be so they could take advantage of an easy, fun way to deal with what can be a serious issue, and also get a sensual gift for the holiday.

"They're a different, sort of atypical gift for Valentine's Day," Lindsay Hicks, senior in sociology, said. "Students can buy them for their girlfriend or boyfriend, but they can also buy them for their friends too, for fun."

Hicks said while the funds raised from the condom rose sales contribute toward expenses for next year, for the most part, the point is "to tell people to protect themselves if they're going to engage in risky behavior."

Weber said she wants students to avoid contracting sexually transmitted diseases and HIV.

"It's all about safety with your partner during this time, especially for Valentine's Day."

Bush defends budget plan, projected tax cuts

By Andrew Taylor
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — As soon as President Bush's budget plan for next year arrived on Capitol Hill, lawmakers pounced on it.

"Scandalous," cried one, who said he's already a "nay" vote because of cuts to education and health. "I am disappointed and even surprised," squealed another, recoiling from proposed cuts in Medicare and Medicaid.

And those were just the Republicans — Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Olympia Snowe of Maine.

The document unveiled Monday clamps down on domestic programs favored by lawmakers and calls for politically perilous cuts to farm subsidies and Medicare that promise to bog down in a Congress already poisoned by election-year politics.

"It's a heavy lift," admitted Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H. "There's no question it's going to be a challenge."

Despite the sacrifices called for in education, Amtrak, community development and local law enforcement grants, health research, and many other programs frozen or cut under his plan, Bush's $2.77 trillion blueprint forecasts a record $423 billion deficit for this year and improves upon that figure in 2007 by lowballing cost estimates for the war in Iraq.

Bush gives a 6.9 percent budget increase to the Pentagon — which would receive $439 billion before accounting for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan — and wants Congress to pass a $3 billion increase in foreign aid.

His proposal projects $70 billion in new funds to execute the war in Iraq through the end of September, which will come in a detailed request later this month and bring total war funding for 2006 to $120 billion. Another $50 billion is allocated for next year.

"My administration has focused the nation's resources on our highest priority — protecting our citizens and our homeland," Bush said in his budget message.

The White House also said it will request another $18 billion or so in hurricane relief in the next few days.

At the same time, Bush proposes to kill or dramatically slash 141 programs for savings of almost $15 billion. Congress is likely to reject many of the cuts, such as a proposal to kill the Commodity Supplemental Food Program, which provides food aid to the very poor.

Major initiatives like making Bush's landmark tax cuts permanent and providing $52 billion in health care tax breaks through 2011 face challenges of their own. Every year, Bush has called for making his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts permanent. Congress has yet to do so.

Most of Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010. Extending them would cost $120 billion in 2011 and $1.2 trillion from 2012-2016.

The White House credits Bush's tax cuts for fueling economic growth and surging tax revenues despite high fuel prices, last year's devastating hurricanes and the recession and terrorist attacks of 2001.

"Those tax cuts are essential toward sustaining the good economic growth we have now," White House Budget Director Joshua Bolten said. "The most important thing we can do with our federal budget is keep a good, strong, growing economy that's generating jobs."

The budget plan projects deficits on a downward trajectory, especially when measured against the size of the economy and meets, at least on paper, Bush's 2004 promise to cut the deficit in half. Then, Bush projected a $521 billion deficit for that year and promised to cut it in half by 2009.

Bush projects a 2009 deficit of $208 billion, but that depends on Congress accepting all of his spending cut proposals. His budget also leaves out the long-term costs of occupying Iraq and Afghanistan, which are impossible to predict with certainty.

During the month of February, the admissions office at the Peters Recreation Complex will extend its hours until 7 p.m. instead of the normal 5 p.m.

"It's a trial to see if we can better serve people by being open later," Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, said.

Robel said the administrative office is staying open later to help people, who might not be able to make it between the hours of 8 a.m. and 5 p.m., with membership, intramural sign-ups and anything requiring payment.

"At Fit Fest in January, we decided to keep the office open that night for people to sign up for things and after that we decided to give it an extended trial," he said.

DIABETES | Students must monitor health

"You establish a pattern that keeps you in balance," she said. "When you alter that pattern, you may have to alter other factors, such as exercise. The whole goal is to establish control."

Netson said registered dietitians are available at all three campus dining centers to help diabetic students find balanced meal options appropriate for their needs.

Seven years later, Schmidt has perfected a careful routine to regulate his diabetes.

He checks his blood five times a day with a quick finger prick. Having switched from insulin injections, he wears a device called a pump that administers insulin into his bloodstream throughout the day.

Aside from check-ups two to three times a year, Schmidt said caring for his diabetes has become so automatic that it holds little significance in his daily routine of classes, working two jobs and practicing with his band.

"Most people don't even know that I'm a diabetic," he said. "I can do anything a normal college student can do. After a while, (treatment) just becomes a habit."

While Schmidt said he had no trouble adapting when he began his college career, Dianna Schalles, health educator and registered dietitian at Lafene Health Center, said many students struggle with the transition from living at home to life on their own.

"It is not an insurmountable obstacle, but it may be a challenge to many students," Schalles said. "Parents have called me with concerns about their sons and daughters. They are afraid of appearing different from their friends and sometimes neglect their health in their pursuit to fit in."

Despite the pressure to fit in, Schalles said she reminds students not to neglect their health, because real friends will not care about their disease.

Schmidt said he usually is alerted to any change in his blood sugar level when he has trouble focusing or feels a bit sluggish. A failure to detect his low blood sugar levels, however, put Schmidt in the emergency room several months ago.

"I work in a lab with lots of liquid nitrogen and burnt my hands pretty badly," he said. "I don't really know how it happened, but I woke up during the car ride to the hospital."

Schmidt's blood sugar level was dangerously low, which he thinks might have affected his decision to pick up an object submerged in the freezing chemical.

"I think my blood sugar was low, or I would have had a quicker reaction time, or would have had gloves on," he said.

Schmidt is the creator of Club Diabetes on the student Web site the Facebook. The club has 53 members, some diabetic and some not.

"I started the club to let other diabetics know they're not alone," he said. "It offers a little support."

ence and secondary education, was one of those who received an e-mail reminder last week.

"I could not figure out how to change it on my own, so I relied on the e-mail they sent me and then used the link. But I knew the deadline was coming up," Ralstin said.

However, there are a few who do not change their eID passwords before the deadline.

"Last spring over 5,200 individuals with valid eIDs did not change their passwords. This includes those who might have graduated and did not need to change," Gould said.

around on you when you throw it in the air."

Freshman Maria Perevoschikova, playing the No. 4 singles spot, defeated Samantha Vander Drift in straight sets, (6-4, 6-4).

Perevoschikova now has won four singles matches in a row.

Senior Jessica Simosa, playing No. 1 singles, lost to Tara Browning in split sets (5-7, 6-2, 6-2). Browning is the No. 77 ranked player in the country.

Sophomore Tamar Kvaratskhelia defeated Cigdem Duru (7-6, 7-5).

The Wildcats, who do not play another match until Feb. 17 in Utah, will have some extra time to work on their problems in practice.

Bietau said the focus will be figuring out what went wrong with doubles.

"We couldn't get anything done with the doubles (Sunday)," Bietau said. "Some things we saw we will have to work on."

Bietau said he believes this match will be a learning experience for K-State.

"In the long run this might be the kind of match that will help us," Bietau said. "To be the team we want to be we have to be tough mentally."

club level called the collegiate. They row against NCAA teams through U.S. Rowing, an overseeing committee.

"We try to go to every regatta we can," Doan, sophomore in biochemistry, said. "Hopefully, we will go to Nationals in Philadelphia sometime this May."

Both the Manhattan Chapter of Habitat for Humanity and K-State crew team met the goals they had set for the event. K-State's Habitat for Humanity is still unsure as to whether or not they met their target.

"The goal was for every person who was involved to raise $200," said Jayme Cooper, sophomore in biology and special events coordinator for the K-State chapter of Habitat for Humanity. "We still don't have the final numbers in because some of the donations that are being mailed in still haven't arrived yet."

The event started 10 years ago when a member of the crew team contacted the Habitat for Humanity about getting together for a fundraiser. Ever since, the event has grown and has been a great success for both the crew team and Habitat for Humanity.

"It's really cool," said Amy Thornborrow, sophomore in mass communications and president of the Kansas State Rowing Association. "For us, we get some money and this year, we started giving the Habitat for Humanity 20 percent instead of 10."

"They really make some good money, and that's what it is all about."

Enduring love

Shawn Decker and Gwenn Barringer deliver a speech, "A Boy, A Girl, A Virus: and the Relationship that Happened Anyway," to attendees Tuesday evening in the Union Ballroom in the K-State Student Union about their relationship despite Decker's diagnosis of being HIV-positive.

Speakers share experiences about dealing with HIV-positive diagnosis throughout sexually-aware relationship, marriage

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shawn Decker and Gwenn Barringer have been together for seven years. On the surface, they seem like typical newlyweds. They are openly affectionate, share in each other's triumphs and losses and are intimate, both emotionally and physically.

One thing, however, sets them apart from other couples. Decker was diagnosed with HIV when he was in the sixth grade.

"What would you do if you fell in love with someone who is HIV-positive?" Barringer asked.

Barringer and Decker delivered a lecture, "A Boy, A Girl, A Virus: and the Relationship that Happened Anyway" at 7 Tuesday evening in the Union Ballroom.

Decker was born with hemophilia and required many blood transfusions during his childhood. He acquired the virus through a tainted blood donation at the age of seven, though he wasn't informed he had HIV until he was 12.

"Everybody has their excuse why it could never happen to them," he said of his diagnosis. "I had hemophilia. I thought I already had mine."

When news of his diagnoses reached the school district and community, Decker was expelled from middle school. His parents battled lawyers, doctors and school board members to overturn his expulsion.

They eventually won, but on Decker's first day back, the school distributed fliers to all the students warning them that a student in the school was HIV-positive.

Decker decided to use his life experience to educate others and launched a personal Web site, www.mypetvirus.com, and also began writing columns for POZ, the nation's largest HIV support magazine. His first book, "My Pet Virus," is scheduled for release in bookstores this September.

It was the couple's shared interest in HIV education that brought them together in the fall of 1998. Barringer said she became motivated to educate young people about

Deadline nears with no filers for president

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The filing deadline for Student Governing Association elections is less than 10 days away, and there have been no filings for student body president and vice president candidates.

Elections commissioner Tanner Banion said he does not know why presidential candidates have not filed yet.

"They have planned out their campaigns," Banion said. "They announce when they think is best and deem necessary in their campaign schedule."

Brandon Sager, Senate Operations Committee chair, said he is not concerned about the lack of candidate filings for student body president and vice president. In the working group of SGA, campaign work already has begun for those who are planning to file, Sager said.

"The way student government works is that we know who is going to run, but they haven't filed yet," Sager said. "There is definitely going to be between three and five pairs running."

The filing deadline for elections is 4 p.m. Feb. 17. Applications should be turned into the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

Buffer could save rare fish in Fort Riley

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A few prairie species being strained by urban development might have their habitats secured if the Fort Riley Army Compatible Use Buffer Zone easements are enacted.

The Topeka Shiner, an endangered species, is a minnow that formerly ranged across the Midwest, but now has Wildcat Creek and the surrounding tributaries as one of its few remaining viable habitats.

The easement program, known as the ACUB, could help secure some of the local habitats around Fort Riley for the Shiner and other grassland species.

The ACUB is a collaboration between private land owners, the Department of Defense and the Kansas Land Trust that would pay private land owners adjacent to Fort Riley to maintain their property undeveloped.

The presentation of the surrounding property is important to the presentation of Wildcat Creek, said Alan Hynek, Fort Riley fish and wildlife administrator.

"About half the watershed comes from private property," he said.

In addition to the Shiner, Fort Riley and the surrounding areas are home to a number of grassland birds whose numbers are declining nationwide, Hynek said.

Commissioners approve board appointees despite controversy

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A few Manhattan residents petitioned the Manhattan City Commission to appoint more diverse candidates to city boards Tuesday night.

"By and large, our boards are made up of white, upper-middle class, if not upper class men," said Christopher Renner, program assistant to the Dean of Education.

Renner asked the commission to table the appointments planned for the meeting and seek out more candidates.

Marilyn Caldwell, Manhattan resident, asked for the same thing.

"I would like to see the boards reflect the diverse population of the town," Caldwell said. "I'm talking about gay rights, about women's rights, about the rights of black people."

The commission approved the board appointees despite the residents' request. They said the decision was based on the appointees' qualifications.

Mayor Pro-Tem Bruce Snead said the appointment process is hampered by an absence of volunteers.

Snead said it would be nice if there were something like a jury pool to pull from, and to pick out people who would have all the desirable benefits, "but what you have is people who volunteer, thank goodness, and are recruited by every mayor."

He said there is a vacancy on the Riley County Health

Board, which is designated for a dentist, and has not been filled for years for this reason.

Commissioner Jayme Morris-Hardeman cited a statistic from the local Court-Appointed Special Advocate program, where she serves as executive director.

"The volunteers that I have are 95 percent Caucasian, and it's not representative of the children we're serving," Morris-Hardeman said.

The meeting also saw a

Snyder to lead Kansas Mentors

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former K-State football coach Bill Snyder is not taking retirement lightly. He is taking on a new project, unrelated to sports.

Snyder, special assistant to the athletic director was announced as the head of the new program Kansas Matters at Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' 2006 State of the State Address on Jan. 9.

"In his 17 years at K-State, he led his teams to victory," Sebelius said during the speech, "but he always knew his most important job was to lead his players to be better people."

Snyder said the program will help existing mentor programs reach all of Kansas.

"The initiative that Gov. Sebelius proposed would allow us to first of all to be able to define existing mentoring programs that are in the state of Kansas, and then to determine the areas that they cover," he said. "By defining that, we will have a good idea of the areas within the state that are not covered by existing mentoring programs."

Snyder, who was raised in a single-parent household, said the mentors will not replace parents.

"Parents serve as mentors, and it's for their own children," he said. "I think everyone recognizes the need for children to have great parenting. We're very careful that people understand that mentoring is not necessarily to take the place of a parent."

Snyder said the program is not out to find fault with current programs, but to assist them in covering more areas.

"There are a significant number of very effective mentoring programs in the state of Kansas presently, and it would be our intent to look over their shoulder or redirect their programs," he said.

"Then we want to expand the program base so that it indeed does cover all areas of the state of Kansas, and, at the same time, would allow every youngster to have access to mentoring."

Snyder said Sebelius approached him a month ago and asked him to be part of the program, and he complied.

"I think there are so many things to undertake and I've got more things on my plate than I wanted or needed," he said. "But when it deals with young people - not kids, but young people in all age groups, that's what I've done all my life and that's extremely important to me. It's a very worthwhile cause and endeavor."

"If it wasn't worthwhile, I wouldn't be doing it."

Snyder said his involvement can be as large as he wants.

"It would be my role as

"When it deals with ... young people in all age groups, that's what I've done all my life and that's extremely important to me."

Bill Snyder
SPECIAL ASSISTANT TO THE ATHLETIC DIRECTOR

much as anything to try to provide some direction to the program itself," he said. "I'm going to encourage ideas with the people that would be involved and perhaps in some traveling throughout the state to meet with a variety of mentoring groups."

A Web site for the program is being formed and might be launched before the end of the month. There will be a 20-person board made up of people from different mentoring associations in the state, including the Boys & Girls Club, YMCA and different faith- and school-based organizations.

The Web site will have information about mentoring and where local groups are and their contact information, and the board will provide input for the site.

"We are forming a group of people to come together periodically to meet and discuss mentoring issues," Snyder said. "These are people who oversee some of the mentoring programs and bring them all together to brainstorm, to seek out new and innovative ways of mentoring, and to be able to put together supporting information for mentoring programs in the state."

Snyder said those involved hope the board selection and the Web site will be completed in the next few months. "We want the Web site to be conducive to interested mentors so they can identify existing programs in their area where they can volunteer," he said. "There will be thoughts about mentoring and some of the how-to's and what to expect. There will also be a place for parents to be able to identify the programs that their children could be involved in."

Roy Crenshaw is the executive director for Big Brothers Big Sisters in Manhattan, Junction City and Wabaunsee and Pottawatomie counties. In the Manhattan area, there are more than 300 mentoring matches with Big Brothers Big Sisters.

Crenshaw said the organization is pleased with Snyder's involvement in the program.

"We're excited about anything that can help mentor and reach children," he said. "We're really glad to see someone like Coach Snyder involved in this."

Ryan Haugaard, senior in interior design, works from his studio in his house Sunday afternoon. Haugaard is the only male in the interior design program at K-State.

Design major juggles job, classes

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Satchel the dog lives in a custom-made doghouse specially designed by his master, Ryan Haugaard. Haugaard takes his abilities to design and create and connects them to all parts of his life.

Haugaard, senior in interior design, said he came to K-State for the architecture program, but, while serving in the National Guard, he was called up to duty, delaying his education.

With a passion for building and design, Haugaard said he switched to interior design, thinking it would be as easy as what he saw on television. He said he was wrong.

"I joined interior design thinking, 'Oh, it will be easy, it's just paint and color and stuff like that,' and it's not really about that," Haugaard said. "I think I followed (what) the HGTV preconceived notions are. It was nothing like that. If you think about it, we spend 80 to 90 percent of our time indoors."

After starting in the interior design program, Haugaard said he has learned the importance of space planning and has enjoyed being able to have a hand in how things are built.

"I think I really like doing something tangible," he said. "I like how it affects the clientele, the people who are going to have that space, whether it's commercially or residentially."

Haugaard said he keeps his days full, juggling classes and running his own construction company, Haugaard Design-Build.

An average day is split between early morning classes and a long day at the work site, Haugaard said, which can be hard to manage at times.

"My studies slack a little bit because of it, but it's more tangible," he said. "I see a direct correlation, so it's almost like a double-edged sword. If I skip a little studying time, it's going to affect me directly in my business world. That's where it gets difficult, and I have to prioritize."

Although Haugaard said he is the only male in the major, it does not affect the way he works in classes and with other people.

"I carry a bit of self-confidence, so I don't really care what they think," he said.

If balancing school and work wasn't enough, Haugaard helped start a new campus organization last semester, the Emerging Green Builders, a group of students interested in sustainable construction.

Michael Dudek, assistant professor of apparel, textiles and interior design, said he was impressed when Haugaard worked to initiate the group, encouraging environmentally-sensitive buildings.

"I knew his business took a lot of time, but he stepped up to the plate and took initiative," Dudek said. "It put my impression of him over the top."

Dudek said Haugaard's hands-on work with his construction company has been beneficial to classmates, allowing Haugaard to share his experience in class.

"He is very willing to share his knowledge," Dudek said. "He has the nuts-and-bolts knowledge and a designer side to him."

Dudek said although Haugaard is the only male in interior design, he handles himself well with classmates and focuses on his studies.

"He doesn't take advantage of being the only male in the program," Dudek said. "He's here to learn and share, and the gender issue doesn't even really play in."

Jared Langford, junior in pastoral ministries at Manhattan Christian College, works for Haugaard Design-Build and is Haugaard's roommate.

Langford said Haugaard is a patient boss and a talented worker.

"He knows what he's talking about," Langford said. "He helps you look at things differently. He looks at the interior and exterior design."

TO THE POINT File for SGA offices sooner to reap benefits

The filing deadline for SGA elections is less than 10 days away, and there have been no filings for student body president and vice president.

In 2005, three tickets for student body president had filed by Feb. 10.

While there have been rumors about when pairs will file, there have been no official filings made in the Office of Student Activities and Services for these two positions.

Those who are planning on running for student body president and vice president should file their tickets as soon as possible. If candidates wait until the last few days to file, the student body might confuse their platform issues.

The longer candidates wait to file their tickets, the less time they have to inform the student body of their platforms. Therefore, candidates are inconveniencing their constituents by not publicizing their opinions on pertinent topics.

The sooner candidates file their tickets will determine how much fair, balanced and accurate coverage students will receive for elections.

Students need to know who is running for the position of student body president and vice president as soon as possible so they can make educated decisions for election day.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Religious rage

Christophobia saturates many facets of life

Muhammad and his followers shouldn't feel alone in their rage over bombastic — so to speak — cartoon calumny. Jesus and his sheep know much about belittlement.

The difference is that Christophobic iconoclasts get a free pass in America.

Vilification of Christ and his faithful is not only overlooked, but often is gleefully praised.

Consider the 1987 taxpayer-funded National Endowment of the Arts awarding $15,000 to Andres Serrano for his artistic achievement, the Piss Christ. This hailed masterpiece depicted Jesus crucified upside down in a jar of urine.

Would the leftist art intelligentsia praise a Muhammad statuette submerged in pee? No, that would be insensitive intolerance of the "religion of peace."

Mel Gibson's "Passion of the Christ" also portrayed Jesus. Did this worldwide critically acclaimed box office smash hit that resurrected the dead languages of First Century Aramaic and Latin earn due artistic accolades?

Nope, "Christ" was passionately sheisted by Oscar. Apparently, the crucifix scene should have been done upside down in a tank of urine.

In 1999, the publicly funded Brooklyn Museum of Art exhibited Chris Ofili's ingenious depiction of the Virgin Mary.

With her breast smeared with elephant dung and close-ups of female genitalia floating around her head like masochistic cherubim — why not fund such artistic genius with Christians' tax dollars?

After all, what are those "turn the other cheek" Christians going to do about it anyway?

Surely counterbalancing private Christian expression is permitted, right?

After the 1999 Columbine massacre, students and their families were allowed by the school to paint memorial tiles for display.

However, all tiles with Christian-based messages like "4/20/99 Jesus wept" were labeled "objectionable" and removed.

Someone should have told those Christian families to first defile their tiles in elephant dung. Maybe then they would have been acceptable.

Rabid Christophobia infects the political realm, as well.

In 2002, the ABA "well-qualified" Harvard-graduate Latino legal stud, Miguel Estrada, was but one judicial nominee filibustered by a minority of liberal Democrats because of his devout Catholic "deeply held religious views."

When it comes to seats on the federal Judiciary, it seems devout Christians need not apply.

Perhaps interfaith amiability exists.

Actually, leader of the Nation of Islam, Louis Farrakhan, denigrates Christianity as the religion that enslaved Africans. Ironically, Farrakhan also endorses the Sudan practice of enslaving Christian men, women and children.

It's no secret the media elites aren't much more sympathetic. Ted Turner shared his enlightened insight that Christianity is a "religion for losers." It's hard to argue with airtight logic like that.

With all this irreligious rage, hypocrisy and viewpoint discrimination from the "tolerant" artistes, politicians and elites, what are Christians to do?

Perhaps tolerance exists in the Academia, where open-minded "free exchange of ideas" reigns.

On the contrary, a Williamsburg Charter Survey reported that one in three academics believe evangelical Christians are a threat to democracy.

With academics like KU Religious Studies professor Paul Mirecki bragging about slapping "fundies" in their "big fat face," it seems the survey was quite accurate.

But, it's cool. Christians accept it. When they get slapped in their big fat faces by artists, politicians and professors, they don't storm the streets with AK-47s. They just remember Jesus' words:

"If the world hates you, remember it first hated me."

Schools' drug testing won't invade privacy

It seems like the public is always questioning our right to privacy, and with the recent dilemma about the Patriot Act, there are other areas that are under scrutiny as Americans begin to wonder what their rights really are.

According to CNN, an all-boys private Christian school in Missouri is trying to phase in mandatory drug testing for all students.

Because private schools can set their own policies instead of following public state education standards, it is easy for these schools to put drug testing as a requirement for sports or other clubs and activities.

With the supposed increase in steroid use among high school students and professional athletes, it seems logical to require drug testing for those involved in activities and events that would be representing the school or organization as a whole.

Although it might seem there was a sudden spike in the number of athletes who began using steroids and other supplements, perhaps administration has failed to notice the issue of drug use in the locker room until lately.

Whatever the origin and figures of teenaged drug use, it is apparent there are many benefits for requiring drug testing in order to attend an accredited high school.

Students testing positive for any type of drug, including steroids, should be placed in a treatment program where they can learn the harmful effects and consequences of what they are putting into their body.

Many kids only focus on the way the drug makes them feel or perform, and ignore or fail to notice the harmful results. Better education and information about how to quit using drugs would definitely help students.

As for the topic of drug testing as a means of invading our right to privacy, usually those with something to hide are the ones who create an uproar.

Letting schools administer drug testing is not the same as the government or other forces searching houses or reading e-mails.

It is true that the decision to use drugs is a personal one, but if students learn the negative effects early and are forced not to use drugs, they are much more likely to not use them as an adult.

Teenagers, for the most part, are dependent on their parents or other guardians.

Therefore, their rights to privacy should be decreased because they are not adults until they are 18.

Schools would conduct these tests for the students' benefit. They have no negative effects — if a student tests negative, then they are allowed to play sports or participate in other extracurriculars.

If a student tests positive, the parents and schools can provide positive influence to decrease the number of teenaged drug users in our country.

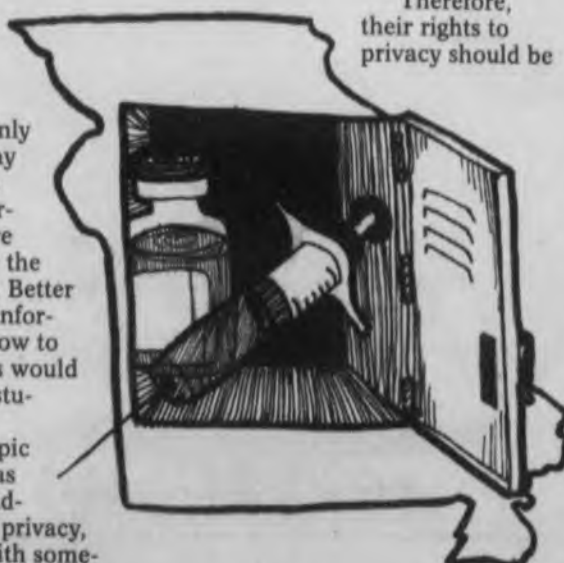

Obviously, this is not a fool-proof plan.

But parents should have a right to know what their children are doing so they can help and encourage them.

Providing negative consequences for students would decrease the pressure of influence.

There are many issues regarding education and the school environment, and it is good to know that administrators are finally taking notice. By attempting to provide the healthiest and most positive learning environment for education, students are destined to succeed.

Alito's presence on U.S. Supreme Court threatens freedom of citizens

Editor,

President George Bush completed his right-wing takeover of the country when Justice Samuel Alito was sworn in. Why is this such a big deal?

Alito has made multiple public statements in recent years to his allegiance to the concept unitary executive. This term means Bush has absolute power, not only over government agencies, but over any domain he chooses as long as he claims national security.

Alito has written why he thinks signing statements are justified. President Bush recently signed the famous McCain Anti-Torture Bill into law, but quietly released a statement saying he does not have to follow it if he decides not to.

Alito has ruled that affidavits are legally equal to search warrants. This means police could write an affidavit for searching an entire neighborhood, but only get a warrant for one house. This effectively eliminates the role of judges in the warrant process.

Alito's allegiance to executive power seems like a poor protection of the American people against illegal wiretapping. Bush has yet to explain why he needs to bypass a secret court which has only rejected three warrants out of 10,000 since 1978. The only rational reason is that he is spying on journalists and possibly peace groups, similar to Nixon, for whom the law was written.

Unless Americans stand up to President Bush during Congressional elections this year, our system of checks and balances is severely threatened by this confirmation.

Columnist alienates male readers by making gross generalizations

Editor,

Since being offended seems to be the new fad, I wish to express how offended I was as a male student by Megan Green's column. She seems to be excluding other important information to confirm her own bitter resentments against the male sex. Did she know that the supposed learning disabilities also have been attributed to teachers being improperly trained to handle young boys? Ask any mother — we're handfuls. We have so much energy that sitting still and learning our ABCs is boring, so we come up with other stuff to do.

I also resent the comment that we resemble monkeys. Now, while I might sound like a whining brat that wears his heart on his sleeve, I want you to imagine the indignation if a male writer had said that women resemble, say, a hippopotamus or any other animal. That author would be immediately labeled a sexist pig. But a female author says men look like monkeys and it's journalism. Oh, sweet hypocrisy.

I would also like to address the fact about girls taking more leadership roles in high school. Do you seriously think that it's because guys cannot do the job? Guys do not care. Let's see. Two hours doing yearbook, or two hours playing football, basketball, and wrestling? Not a very difficult decision for most guys.

Women with unwanted pregnancies will find a way to have an abortion

Editor,

I read Brandon Speight's letter to the editor and felt I must respond.

For Speight to compare using drugs or underage drinking to abortion because "they're going to do it anyway" is making a leap the size of the Grand Canyon. The life-changing decision to end a pregnancy is hardly on the same scale as deciding to take a drink or use drugs, where the effect might last an hour or two.

I attended K-State in the late '60s and early '70s, before Roe v. Wade. Desperate young women will get abortions whether they are legal and safe or illegal and unsafe.

There is a reason that abortion laws needed to change. Medical students came to Manhattan once or twice a month. These were students, not even interns or residents. I heard of others who went to people who had no medical training whatsoever. They performed illegal abortions at low-priced local hotels or frat houses where no one questioned the comings of young women.

Wealthy women will always be able to afford safe abortions. It is the young and poor who will suffer if safe and legal abortions are not available. If anti-rights advocates think that women will just accept their views, they are sadly misguided.

Young women must appreciate the work and efforts of the generations before Roe v. Wade. No one is forced to get an abortion. But no one should be forced to continue an unwanted pregnancy, either. That is why choice is such a gift. Appreciate that gift and fight to keep it.

Republicans determined to kill Social Security, other programs

Editor,

Ryan Spencer's letter to the editor Feb. 7, "Democrats Should Support Solutions Despite Politics" was filled with so many outrageous statements that I hardly knew where to begin.

The only reason Social Security will "die" is because Republicans are determined to kill it. It is a flawed system, but one that is vital to our society. Social Security is a compulsory program because there are millions of Americans who are too poor to put money into retirement.

So here is my question for the right: What is it about social programs that help people that infuriates you so much? Your party preaches a constant line of small government and smart spending, yet you re-elect a President who created the Homeland Security Department — the largest bureaucracy in U.S. history — and has run up a $300 billion-plus deficit. You support a President who this week introduced a budget that attempts to make permanent tax cuts to the wealthiest of Americans, while cutting money to programs such as Medicare which help the poorest.

Democrats will not support a president whose policies further marginalize the most disadvantaged members of society.

Speech addresses human rights

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Harald Prins, distinguished professor of anthropology, addressed the need to understand human rights when he delivered a speech as part of the Vernon Larson International Luncheon Lecture Series on Tuesday in the Ramada Plaza Ballroom.

Prins delivered the lecture "UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) in Defense of Human Rights: An Anthropologists' Experience." The organization is a branch of the United Nations, which was founded in 1945 after World War II.

Prins has worked closely with this organization in his many years working with human rights.

"The term 'human rights' is something we hear all the time, but the meaning is not always clear," Prins said. "We often think of foreign places, but this is not the case — it goes on here as well. We also tend to think that these people did something to deserve it, but that is also not the truth."

Prins went on to explain how, while working in Argentina, he was picked up by the federal police of the country.

As a country that does not follow the law of human rights, Prins said he was worried about the outcome and what they would do to him. His colleague alerted a friend, a police commander, of the situation, and rescued him.

"Many countries are engaged in human rights violations, and we don't give them enough attention in this country," Prins said.

He also spoke of war, and how he thinks it needs to be the "final solution." He referred to President Truman's quote, after Hiroshima, "I didn't lose a minute's sleep over it."

"I thought that was very inhuman, and it changed my perspective on Truman," Prins said.

Prins went on to give death statistics related to war in the 20th century. He said by genocide and tyranny, 83,000,000 have been killed, and 42,000,000 have been the victim of a military war death.

Prins was born and raised in the Netherlands, and has been a professor at K-State since 1990. He has done research in North and South America and Israel.

Prins has been an international observer for elections in Argentina and is internationally known for his scholarship.

"I wanted to listen to a fellow Dutchman, since that is where I am from," Christina van Swaay, a Manhattan resident and Netherlands native, said. "I am interested in UNESCO since I don't know a lot about it, and I am all for human rights."

Many regulars to the lecture series also were impressed with Prins' lecture.

"I come to see all of the lectures," Nancy Calhoun, Manhattan resident said. "He is a very interesting speaker, and he definitely brings a lot to the lecture, with a great point of view."

Junction City unveils summer collegiate baseball team

By Kevin Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Starting this summer, college baseball players will have another option on where to spend June through August, as Junction City will be the home of a new summer baseball team.

The team, called the Junction City Generals, and mascot were revealed Feb. 1 in Junction City by Jay Lucas, Central Plains Baseball League commissioner and Karl Carswell, League president. They also introduced the team Web site, 2006 game schedule and season-ticket information.

This summer there will be one Junction City team, which will serve as the "flagship" club for the CPB League, a summer collegiate baseball league that is coming to the Midwest in June 2007.

The Generals will play at Rather Stadium in Junction City and will compete nationwide with other independent teams in 2006, said senior B.J. Kissel, pitcher for the K-State baseball team, who will be the team's general manager this summer when he graduates in May.

"We want this league to be one of the best summer leagues in the country," Kissel said.

While the Generals are the lone team competing from the CPB League this summer, there are six to eight teams committed to playing in summer 2007 in the league, in cities such as Hastings, Neb.; El Dorado, Kan.; Kansas City, Kan.; and Wichita, Kissel said.

The idea behind the league is to attract top-collegiate baseball players nationwide who want to compete under semi-professional conditions. With other leagues such as this operating on the coasts, the CPB League is aimed at keeping Big 12 Conference players in the Midwest, said Carol Gould, public relations, Junction City.

In addition to keeping players in the Midwest, the league also intends to offer entertainment value, she said.

"We want to provide a unique entertainment option, featuring collegiate baseball's up-and-coming players in a family-friendly environment,"

Gould said.

The future success of this league is undetermined, as there are a few hurdles standing in the way. There are no fields to play on, and the league wants to bring in more teams, but with the popularity and strength of the Cape Cod, Alaskan and Coastal Plains Leagues, it could be challenging, Kissel said.

When asked about the uphill struggle to compete for the

NFL | Edwards fills out staff with three coaches

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — New Kansas City Chiefs coach Herm Edwards filled his coaching staff on Tuesday

when he announced the hiring of former Auburn defensive coordinator David Gibbs to coach the secondary.

Edwards also named former UCLA assistant Jon Embree tight ends coach and former Iowa graduate assistant Mike Ketchum offensive assistant in charge of quality control.

Gibbs is no stranger to Kansas City, after coaching the defensive backs for the Denver Broncos from 2001 to 2004. He helped Auburn to a No. 14 national ranking last season.

Embree played college football at Colorado before spending 10 seasons there as an assistant coach. He spent the past three seasons at UCLA.

While Ketchum was at Iowa, the Hawkeyes had a 27-10 record and won two bowl games.

K-State Trapshooting Club trying to bring back popularity of sport

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fred Smith and Rob Taylor vividly recall the night they decided to bring trapshooting back to K-State.

"We were sitting out (at Tuttle Creek Shooting Park) on a cold winter night," Smith, accounting instructor said. "Rob said, 'There are 20,000 students at K-State. Some of them have to be interested in trap shooting.'"

Taylor recalled when the university used to have a trapshooting following.

"K-State used to have a very successful trap club, a winning club," said Taylor, owner of Tuttle Creek Shooting Park. "I said we needed to get that going again. Fred got the ball rolling, and 30 days later, we had a team."

The club started in January 2005 with Smith serving as faculty adviser. Smith said he credits Taylor with helping him get the program up and running.

"If it weren't for (Taylor), we wouldn't have a club," Smith said. "He's been a club mentor and provided us with resources and a place to practice."

Taylor, a six-time All-American trapshooter, said having a club at K-State helps educate people about gun safety and provides positive publicity for shooting sports.

The NCAA does not recognize any shotgun sports, so schools usually organize their own tournaments,

About trapshooting

■ A trapshooting squad consists of five shooters. The shooters stand in a semicircle around the trap house. The squad leader stands in the far-left position, known as the first post. The squad leader gives the "pull" command and fires at the first target. The shooters then fire sequentially until each shooter has fired at five targets. At that point, the round is over and each shooter rotates to the left. The squad continues this rotation until each shooter has fired five shots from each post.

■ Depending on skill level, trapshooters are assigned a handicap. A shooter's handicap determines how far he or she stands from the trap house. The highest possible handicap is 27, meaning the shooter must stand 27 yards from the trap house.

Source: www.youthtrapshooter.com

Smith said.

"Mostly, schools will organize a shoot, and everybody tries to get there and compete as a team," Smith said.

K-State competes in four or five tournaments each fall and spring.

Wooldridge's confusing actions raise unanswered questions

Jim Wooldridge is an admirable guy.

He's classy, a gentleman, excited, passionate and a fighter, particularly right now. In the midst of getting surgery, assistant coach Charles Baker said Wooldridge's still trying to coach his team.

Best wishes, Coach Wooldridge. I sincerely hope you have a speedy recovery.

But just because I respect him, doesn't mean I necessarily have to agree with him or understand his recent decisions.

Early on, I was convinced this K-State basketball team was "the" K-State basketball team. The team that was going to make it to the third round of the Big 12 Tournament (call me crazy) and then head confidently into March Madness and receive an NCAA Tourney bid. From there, Sweet Sixteen, Elite Eight, Final Four, National Championship — just kidding, not that optimistic.

I know that's a lot to expect out of one team in five months, but this year's roster, coupled with the unpredictable Big 12 Conference (i.e. K-State beats Kansas, Oklahoma beats Texas, Oklahoma loses to Missouri, K-State beats Missouri, K-State loses to Baylor, etc.) — this was the perfect equation for Wildcat success.

Recently, however, Woolly has got me all sorts of confused. I know I'm not Albert Einstein, but I'm not stupid (aside from the D in Art Foundations in high school). Wooldridge's coaching decisions, as of late, have left me puzzled. Whether it's substitutions, rotations, play calling, whatever the case, the past five games have left me with many questions.

Thus, I have compiled a list of questions for Wooldridge, assistant coach Jimmy Elgas and Baker and/or anyone else who's got the answers:

1.) Why, when players are contributing to the game, do you take them out? There have been numerous times when players are stepping up on offense or defense, and they are immediately replaced. Texas A&M was the perfect example — sophomore Curtis Allen, junior Tyler Hughes and senior Schyler Thomas (see No. 4) were all pulled once they heated up.

2.) Which leads to my next question — why is junior Lance Harris a favorite substitute of yours? I'm not saying Harris isn't a good player. When he's on, he's good. But like many other Wildcats, he's failed to show any form of consistency but continues to get big minutes.

Job fair freebies

Columnist comes away from Engineering fair with bags full of loot

Every year there is a contingent of us engineers who are assigned something special for the Engineering Career Fair. We find the other side of the job fair — loot.

Somewhere, someone said, "We will get better recruits if we give away cheap promotional junk." And hence the junk was begun. Like one company rep said, it is Halloween for adults. Almost everyone has free junk.

There is a disclaimer involved. Passing judgment on a company only by what they give away isn't good practice. It is easy to think they obviously don't care about future employees if the freebies are lacking.

Of course, some have good stuff and some have lame junk that can't even double as a paperweight. Most of the time recruiters say "here, take another."

Only one person in all the companies was selfish with their freebies. Ironically, it was the company my dad works for.

So what was my take?

How big is my stash?

TYRONE SCHURR

I had to make two trips with my backpack full. I won't have to buy another pen for years. I garnered about 100 pens and pencils.

Everyone has pens and pencils at the fair. Nebraska Department of Roads had the worst pens overall, which all failed the first use test. Even after they started working, they were substandard.

The flexible pens were new this year. They were cool enough for mine to have been stolen.

At the other end of the scale were unsharpened pencils. Who wants free stuff that causes more work? Besides, I can't remember the last time I saw a pencil sharpener.

There was the same-old stuff available this year. However, the same-old stuff is not all bad. Garmin, who has the same stuff every year, also has the best lip balm. I grabbed about 10 to stock up for the year.

Thirteen companies had can Koozies, of which only two were purple. I've never really used one, so I'll give them away.

People don't really ask for Koozies like they do for things that blink. Most blinky things come in the form of a ball, which is good for impromptu midnight dodgeball.

Other things to throw would be all the foam toys. Foam toys are always common. Want a daytime war with your roommate? Foam toys are a way to go. Less damage, fewer scars and more of your possessions remain intact.

The best junk was the world on an elastic string. Great for people with pets, or if you want to annoy people by almost hitting them. Practice before public use.

Most everyone has candy, but two companies had actual chocolate bars. The same chocolate bars they had last year, however, only one company tasted like it was left from last year.

Can you find a job at a career fair? Probably. Do other schools have their own fairs with cool stuff? I don't know. Were my classes cancelled? Yes, which makes it all that much better.

Engineering Career Fair awards

The Best Foam Toy: The earth ball on the elastic string was the most fun. Kleinfelder should come back with a bigger box of them next year.

The Best Can Koozie: Most koozies were really generic and only two were purple. However the award goes to the PinnacleOne koozie because it was made for water bottles.

The Best New Item: Free music download cards. One song is a little skimpy, so I took six total from two companies. The companies don't get awards — the idea does.

Most Annoying Item: The spin top from Kirkham Michael. It lights up and plays music when spun. Though it can spin for close to a minute, the song it plays is unidentifiable.

Best In Show: Seeing the joy in the eyes of my peers caused by the Affinis Corp. goo-filled stress ball makes it the winner. It was like watching kids at Christmas.

Honorable Mention goes to the classic toys such as: Target's silly putty, the Archer balsa planes and the Kirkham Michael, Inc., mini slinky.

Gail Tremblay, junior in political science, found out about the concert from a poster in her sorority house.

"It looked like it'd be interesting," Tremblay said.

She said she would like to see more artists like Tamkin perform at the Union.

"It fit with my musical preference," Tremblay said. "It was easy-going and upbeat. He was funny and good-looking."

More than 120 students attended the event, and the audience was receptive to Tamkin, whose jokes and songs kept their attention for an hour. He interacted with the crowd by having them clap along to one of his songs and by asking them to join in on songs like "Video Killed the Radio Star" and "In Your Eyes."

Tamkin, who has been playing since the fifth grade, said he is on the first week of his two-week tour that will take him to Omaha, Neb.; Tennessee; Alabama; and back home to Chicago.

"It's nice to play along the way instead of driving 10 hours to every city," Tamkin said. "I always look forward to playing in front of new people."

Tamkin said he was happy with the outcome of the night. "Anytime you can see someone relate to lyrics you wrote, and connecting to you in that way, it's really cool," Tamkin said. "That's why I do it."

Throughout the concert, Tamkin expressed his gratitude to the audience for their attendance.

Kurt Fenster, junior in theater and arts co-chair of the Union Program Council, said he was satisfied with Tamkin's performance. He heard about him from one of the talent agencies the UPC works with.

"We listened to his stuff and thought he was a great artist, and we were able to have him come," Fenster said.

This is the second year UPC has had the Buzz. In 2004-05, it was on Thursdays. Fenster said they changed it because of the parking on Thursday evenings.

Tremblay said she likes having the Buzz on Tuesdays.

"I thought it was nice because later in the week, you get busy," Tremblay said.

"It's something to break up the week."

Fenster said UPC tries to entertain a wide audience during the Buzz's performances that occur every other Tuesday.

"We try to have a very diverse selection," Fenster said. "We try to give people a show that they'll enjoy."

Stones upset about Super Bowl censoring

NEW YORK — Nobody turns off the microphone on Mick Jagger without a fight.

Censorship of their songs during the Super Bowl halftime show was "absolutely ridiculous and completely unnecessary," the Rolling Stones said through a spokeswoman on Tuesday.

The NFL, which produced the show seen on ABC Sunday night, silenced Jagger's microphone during "Start Me Up," — one word close to the song's end, a reference to a woman so sexy she could arouse a dead man. Another lyric for "Rough Justice" included a synonym for rooster that was removed.

The football league, still nervous over the Janet Jackson wardrobe malfunction two years ago at the Super Bowl, has said it wanted to ensure family entertainment at the game.

"The band was aware of our plan to simply lower Mick's mike at the appropriate moments," said Brian McCarthy, NFL spokesman. "It was discussed with the group last week prior to the Super Bowl."

The band may have known about it, but that doesn't mean they liked it, spokeswoman Fran Curtis said.

Jay-Z, Linkin Park

to perform at Grammys

SANTA MONICA, Calif. — The Recording Academy announced Monday multiple Grammy winner and rap mogul Shawn "Jay-Z" Carter will perform with Grammy-winning rockers Linkin Park — nominated for a Grammy for their groundbreaking collaboration, "Numb/Encore."

Other newly announced presenters include Grammy nominee Alicia Keys and comedian/actor Dave Chappelle. Nominee Anoushka Shankar — up for Best Contemporary World Music Album — will perform during the Grammy pre-telecast ceremony.

The 48th Annual Grammy Awards hosted by singer and actress Queen Latifah will air at 7 tonight on CBS.

Alumna's life inspires career in comedy

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

By day, Susan Dale waits tables at a Mexican restaurant and sells women's shoes at Dillard's in Tulsa, Okla. At night, Dale, a 40-year-old wife and mother, becomes the comedian she was born to be.

David Ollington, assistant professor of dance, said he met Susan Dale when the two performed in the summer performance "The Wizard of Oz" in Manhattan's Arts in the Park. Ollington was the cowardly lion, and 6-year-old Dale was a munchkin.

Ollington said he took lessons from Dale's mother, a dance teacher, and remembered when Dale would come and watch classes.

Born and raised in Manhattan, Kan., Dale graduated from Manhattan High School in 1984 and later received a degree in dance from K-State in 1988.

Dale said she moved to Tulsa, Okla., and worked in the retail business for 18 years selling dance costumes.

She said her initial interest in comedy started after cracking jokes with a club comedian, saving his show with her comments and keeping the audience laughing.

"But I didn't have the confidence to go for it," she said.

While serving as a waitress at the Tulsa Comedy Club, Dale said she kept her table laughing. After the customers listened to her, Dale said they thought she should replace comic emceeing the show.

"People were telling the comic, 'Susan the waitress is funnier than you,'" Dale said. "When the comic came down, he said, 'The sad part is, you are funnier than I am.'"

Later, Dale said she was the only comic in Oklahoma asked to perform in the Las Vegas Comedy Festival. While there, Dale said she also performed at the National Association of Television Program Executive, rubbing elbows with executives from Sony and Paramount.

"I was laughing, because they don't realize I'm red trash," Dale said.

Red trash?

Dale laughed as she tripped into part of her comedy act and explained.

"I'm half-white trash and half redneck," she said. "Red trash. You see, rednecks fly the American flag, and white trash fly the Wal-Mart sack. We fly the American flag with the Wal-Mart sack underneath."

Dale said her comedy is family-based, and she tries to keep it clean.

Basing much of her comedy off of life experience, Dale said her family is a huge source of material, including her parents, brothers and 101-and-1/2-year-old grandmother.

"All you have to do is look at what's in front of you," Dale said. "Life is good. Life is fun."

In the near future, Dale said she will be performing at the Will Roger's Festival in Oklahoma as well as continuing to perform at private parties. Dale also has been working on a script for a sitcom based on her life that she wants to produce in the Midwest.

Struggling with dyslexia as a child, Dale said she would fall back on laughter to keep her positive.

"I give a lot of credit to my parents," Dale said. "How do you survive life when you're not like everyone else. I didn't want to make fun of other people, so I would just make fun of myself."

Dale's mother Randi said when her daughter was young, she was shy and did not talk much.

"But then she laughed so much in junior high," Randi said. "As she matured, she became more outgoing."

A local dance teacher, Randi and her husband Melvin still live in Manhattan, watching their daughter's success unfold.

"Comedy kind of came in on the sideline," Randi said. "She was always funny with one-liners that came out of her."

K-STATE ALUMNA

Study: Youth voting increasing

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More young people voted in the 2004 presidential elections than in 2000, according to a recent study. However, Kansas ranks as one of the lowest states with youth voter turnout.

Officials with the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement, in College Park, Md., the group that conducted the study, said turnout with 18- to 24-year-olds was higher in "battle-ground" states, where the outcome of the presidential election was in doubt.

Most states had a 47-percent youth voter turnout, but "Kansas was not one of those states," Abby Kiesa, youth coordinator at CIR-CLE, said.

Based on Census data and poll results, however, state officials disagree with the study's accuracy.

"We certainly believe (youth voting) is higher," said Stephanie Wing, a spokeswoman for Kansas Secretary of State Ron Thornburg. In a press conference last month, she said that because the state cannot keep track of those numbers, "there's no way to be certain of that."

Several K-State organizations, including Student Governing Association and political groups, have attempted to increase the number of registered voters on campus.

Last week, Young Democrats and College Republicans debated hot-button political issues, including social security, welfare, gay marriage and foreign policy.

"I think it's something we always struggle with, you know, getting youth involved in politics," said Joelle Mausolf, vice president of Young Democrats and senior in pre-law and political science. "I thought that the debate last week was a good combination between the two groups. Several people attended the debate."

While Mausolf said the political debate was successful, she also said that throughout the year, Young Democrats and College Republicans aim to increase the number of registered voters.

"We try to get people involved in the process," Mausolf said. "Maybe one of the reasons (for low voter turnout) is young people tend to vote a little bit more democratic. And since we live in a red state, maybe they feel like it's pointless."

When the younger population doesn't vote, however, some argue legislators are likely to ignore youth-related issues on the agenda.

"Sometimes I just don't understand why I need to go and plead my case through

Youth Vote

■ Approximately 40 percent of Kansas youth, those 18- to 24-years-old, voted in 2004. More than two-thirds of Kansans 25 and older voted in 2004.

■ In 1972, nearly 59 percent of Kansas youth, those 18- to 24-years-old, voted. About 36 percent of Kansans 25 and older voted in 1972.

■ In presidential election years between 1972 and 2000, the national voter turnout rate had declined by 16 percent among young citizens before rebounding by 11 percent in the 2004 election.

■ Single young people, particularly women, are more likely to vote than married young people. The turnout among single women age 18-24 increased by 12 percent, to about one-third, since 2000.

■ In 2004, much of the surge in youth voting was driven by an increase in voting among African-American youth. African-American turnout fell off in the 1988 election and remained relatively stable until the 2004 election, in which African-Americans experienced a jump in turnout of more than 11 percent over that in 2000, the greatest increase in turnout of any racial or ethnic minority group during the recent election cycle.

■ About nine out of 10 local party leaders say youth political engagement is a serious problem.

■ Nearly 93 percent of local party leaders say they feel local parties can make a big difference in getting young people involved in politics.

■ Only 8 percent of party chairs identified young people as the most important demographic for the "long-term success of their party," compared to 21 percent who named senior citizens.

voting," Manhattan resident Kris Guthrie, 19 said. "I do believe, however, that some students really need to rethink their voting strategy. They should vote for issues in areas that influence their lives most, meaning if you live here in Riley eight months out of the year, you should vote in this district."

While increasing the number of voters is a top priority for those conducting registration drives, Manhattan resident Mary Sickles said any effort made by youth is an effort that won't go unnoticed.

"We might rank low with voting," Sickles said, "but we have youth who are going to start caring. Issues are always pertinent to the youth population, and I'm excited to see what legislators and teens will both come up with in the future."

Leak forces Fossett to delay GlobalFlyer takeoff

By Mike Schneider
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Aviation record-setter Steve Fossett thought he had his aircraft's fuel leak problem licked. But it foiled his plans Tuesday morning, stopping his takeoff on a planned round-the-world flight.

Fossett hoped to try again early Wednesday. His goal is to break a 20-year-old distance record by flying the Virgin Atlantic GlobalFlyer about 27,000 miles nonstop for more than 3 1/2 days.

"This is disappointing, but we've been through this before," Fossett said after aborting his flight Tuesday morning.

His glider-like craft lost thousands of pounds of fuel last year during that nonstop flight around the world.

This time there were problems with a fuel vent system that had been replaced because of last year's troubles.

The fix is easy — replacing seals on the vents.

Even if the fuel leak hadn't resurfaced, Fossett said it was likely winds would have kept him from taking off Tuesday.

"In any adventure like this, there are always uncertainties," said Richard Branson, whose company, Virgin Atlantic, is sponsoring the flight.

Fossett already holds the record for flying solo around the globe in a balloon and for being the first person to circle the globe solo in a plane without stopping or refueling.

Shawn Decker speaks one-on-one with Jason Schwindt, senior in pre-professional business administration, about his relationship with his wife despite his HIV-positive diagnosis. Decker received the virus through an infected blood transfusion when he was seven. He was diagnosed five years later.

Steven Doff | COLLEGIAN

HIV | Couple chronicles relationship amid illness

HIV after hearing a guest speaker while attending college, and Decker became passionate about the issue after coming to terms with his own diagnosis.

The pair hit it off as friends, but soon realized their feelings went beyond friendship.

"One of the things that drew me to Gwenn when we first met was that she was involved in HIV and AIDS and she wasn't positive herself," Decker said. "Most of the people I had met through this were either infected themselves or had family or friends who were."

Though Barringer admits her family wasn't exactly thrilled at first, they liked Decker right away and are now completely supportive of the relationship,

The couple wed in October 2004, and seven years after the relationship began, Barringer is still HIV-negative. She gets tested for the disease about twice a year, but is confident in the protection methods the couple use. They use a condom each and every time, and most condom failures are a result of human error rather than a faulty product, Decker said.

"I hear a lot of people say that using a condom breaks the romance of the moment," he said. "For me, a condom isn't a downer, it's an upper – because I know I'm doing the right thing."

There also are post-exposure medications available that drastically reduce the chances of HIV contraction, in case a condom should tear, he said.

If the couple chooses, there are options available if they decide to have a child. In addition to adoption, there is a method called sperm-washing that can be used in such circumstances.

While the virus is present in semen, it does not exist in sperm. Through this process, the semen and the sperm are separated. If the sperm test HIV-negative, they can be used for artificial insemination.

The couple is currently employed by an organization called CAMPUSPEAK, which provides speakers and programs for college campuses and organizations. The couple has made educating young Americans about HIV a full-time profession, and deliver an average of 10 lectures each semester.

off problems of encroaching development, which can make military training areas islands for retreating species.

One military base facing such a problem is Fort Bragg, N.C.

The woods of the base's training area have become one of the last refuges for the red-cockaded woodpecker, which is protected under the Endangered Species Act.

Hynek said the easements will hopefully avoid such a scenario.

"An area gets developed ... and the installation winds up being kind of an island, and that's what we're trying to avoid," Hynek said.

The U.S. Army, as a federal agency, is required by law to protect endangered species, and Fort Riley has been proactive in securing the habitats said Vernon Tabor, fish and wildlife biologist for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

Fort Riley is required to compose an Integrated National Resource Management Plan for every endangered species with a habitat inside the base's borders, Tabor said.

The INRMP then is used to balance military training with habitat presentation.

In addition to the INRMP, Fort Riley conducts habitat improvement and coordinates with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Services.

The preservation of habitat is vital to the survival of the Shiner, which does not withstand urbanization pressure very well, Tabor said.

Keith Gido, assistant professor of biology, said the local environment has one of the last few healthy populations of Topeka Shiners.

"It's gone from Iowa – Missouri populations are not doing well at all," he said.

nations' top players and how to lure them away from the coasts back to the Midwest, Gould said Carswell knows how to tackle the problem.

"Carl played in the Cape, so he knows what it takes to play at that level," Gould said. "The goal is recognition and representation from the Big 12, and it'll take a while, but we have to rely on him."

He also has former professionals, like Buck O'Neil, supporting his cause.

"He knows the game, and with a good group of leaders in the front office, including Negro League Hall of Famer Buck O'Neil, we think they can make it happen."

K-State baseball coach Brad Hill said summer baseball leagues are a good idea for college players.

"Good leagues, bad leagues, easy competition, tough competition," Hill said. "Our guys need to go out there every day and play."

school day of the semester will determine the number of positions available for college senator positions.

The number of positions for college councils is predetermined by each college constitution, Banion said.

The College of Arts and Sciences typically has the most candidates run for senate and council positions, but each college usually has enough candidates running for positions, Banion said.

"We usually have the numbers to match the number of positions on the ballot for the college," he said.

Banion said write-in candidates are an option during elections. Write-in candidates are not required to fill out a filing form, but they are required to fill out a contribution sheet and receipt summary pages, he said.

Individuals who have been disqualified by the elections review committee or elections commissioner from the primary or general election shall not be elected as a write-in candidate from the position of which they were disqualified, Banion said.

"It's unfair to allow people who did not file the proper forms to win an office," he said.

Reserve Fund. The fund is meant to hold money for use on a later public project, but not on payroll or equipment purchases.

Bernie Hayen, director of City Finance, said the money is the result of unexpected booms in tax revenue in 2004 and 2005 coupled with "underspending" on the city's part.

Hayen said the city has an estimated $4.6 million budget leftover from 2005.

He said $2.5 million of it has been budgeted, leaving an estimated $2.1 million surplus. The $1.2 million reserve fund came from this surplus.

Hayen said this leaves between $900,000 and $1 million that he expects to be used to lower property taxes collected by the city.

SHOOTING | Scholarships the goal for the future

Smith said. Other competing schools include Missouri, Missouri State, Colorado and Iowa State.

The K-State trap team also competes at the national championship tournament, which features more than 1,000 collegiate shooters, Smith said.

In its first season of competition, the K-State trapshooting team placed 22nd at the national tournament. This year's national championship tournament will take place April 5-9 in San Antonio, Texas.

Smith said a solid finish this season would help the club accomplish its goal of adding scholarships.

"Eventually, our goal is to gain scholarship shooters to compete more," Smith said. "If we could win a national championship and raise money for scholarship shooters, that would be huge."

Smith said the ability to offer scholarships is a tremendous advantage for a trapshooting club. Last year's national champion, Lindenwood University of St. Charles, Mo., offers 60 shooting scholarships, Smith said.

"Lindenwood is the top trapshooting college in the nation," Smith said. "Nobody else can compete."

Smith said he hopes the club will receive enough private donations to fund five $500 scholarships each year. Until then, Smith said the trapshooting talent in the Midwest and K-State's strong academic reputation helps his team stay competitive.

Randy Eilerts, senior in animal science and president of the K-State trapshooting club, said he chose K-State for its agriculture program. Although he'd participated in other shooting sports, Eilerts said he never shot trap before coming to K-State.

When he had the opportunity to join the trapshooting club, he decided to give it a try. Eilerts said his decision was a good one.

"It's been pretty enjoyable," Eilerts said. "I've had the chance to meet a lot of new people and try out of lot of shooting ranges."

Three men's jerseys already gaze down upon the players, coaches and fans from the rafters in Bramlage Coliseum. Three former K-State All-Americans in Ernie Barrett, Jack Parr and Bob Boozer loom above the court, marking a dynamic period in K-State basketball during the late 1940s and early 1950s.

Tonight, when past greats Lon Kruger, Chuckie Williams and Mike Evans take the court at halftime to have their jerseys retired, the program will travel back in time more than 30 years, if only for a couple minutes, to a time when winning was synonymous with K-State basketball.

"I think it'll be great for the program, because those guys meant an awful lot to K-State basketball. To see their jerseys hanging in the rafters is a good thing," said assistant coach Charles Barker, who watched the trio play when he was growing up.

Barrett, Parr and Boozer marked the first round of men's basketball players to have their jerseys retired in their induction in February 2005. For this next generation to hang with them in the rafters is quite a tribute for the new threesome, Kruger said.

"It's something you don't take lightly," Kruger said. "It's a huge honor, if you think about the gentlemen who have been honored, and joining Chuckie and Mike. It's a very special honor."

All three men were members of K-State's All-Century basketball team, named on March 1, 2003; Kruger and Evans are both part of the K-State Sports Hall of Fame. What was it, though, that got these former Wildcats this far?

A lot has changed in the K-State basketball program since the last time Kruger, Williams and Evans stepped on the court in Manhattan in the 1970s.

The court the trio called home was Ahearn Field House — not Bramlage Coliseum, which was completed in 1988. Additionally, the team was coached by Jack Hartman, the all-time winningest coach in K-State history in his tenure from 1970-86, including three Big Eight Conference titles and nine postseason appearances.

Perhaps the most memorable element to this trio — for those who bore witness — was the dominance they exercised in the Big Eight, and nation for that matter, and the winning tradition they established at K-State.

"It was a terrific time," Kruger said of playing at K-State. "I can't imagine experiencing anything better — I mean, the players, fans, coaches."

Kruger played under Hartman from 1971-74 and was the Big Eight's Newcomer of the Year. He was only one of two Wildcats, in addition to Evans, to be named Big Eight player of the year twice (1973, 1974) and was dubbed first-team All-Big Eight in the same years. Kruger was part of a 61-22 squad during his stint, and he led the Cats to two NCAA Elite Eight appearances and two Big Eight regular-season crowns.

Following his collegiate career, the Silver Lake, Kan., native was drafted by the National Basketball Association's Atlanta Hawks and Major League Baseball's St. Louis Cardinals but opted to play professional basketball in Israel from 1974-75.

In 1976, he took a coaching job at Pittsburg State and then came back to K-State, to be an assistant coach under the legendary Hartman. He helped guide the Cats to a 103-49 record (1977-82), including three tourney visits and the 1980 Big Eight Tournament Championship. He went to Texas Pan-American to become the head coach and athletics director from 1982-86.

Upon Hartman's retirement, Kruger returned to the Wildcats as the head coach in 1986 and directed K-State to an 81-47 record, becoming the first coach to guide four-straight teams to the NCAA Tournament.

"It turned out to be ideal, with my relationship and feelings for the university," Kruger said. "Hartman was a legendary coach who did remarkable things. I was fortunate enough to play and coach with him."

He left Manhattan in 1990 and coached the Florida Gators for six seasons, followed by a four-year stop as coach at Illinois. In May 2000, he joined the NBA ranks as coach for the Atlanta Hawks, where he tallied a 69-122 record in two-and-a-half years. After a brief stint as assistant coach with the New York Knicks, he departed the NBA for college basketball, landing at University-Las Vegas, where he is still coaching.

"I didn't like the losing part of it (NBA)," Kruger said. "The opportunity to work with young people is the most appealing part of (college basketball)."

Chuckie Williams played for Hartman from 1972-76 and contributed to an 82-30 K-State record during his career, comprised of two NCAA Elite Eight outings and the Big Eight regular-season title in 1973. He was first-team All-Big Eight twice.

Following his collegiate career, he, at the time, was the second player in school history to be picked in the first round of the NBA Draft by the Cleveland Cavaliers in 1976.

Mike Evans — who is K-State's all-time leading scorer with 2,115 points — played under Hartman from 1974-78 and was honored as Big Eight Newcomer of the Year. He pushed the Wildcats to an 82-35 record in his four years, including three postseason showings and the 1977 Big Eight regular season and tournament championships. Evans joins Kruger as one of two players ever to be recognized as the Big Eight Conference Player of the Year twice (1977, 1978) and one of three players in history to receive first team all-conference honors three times. He also is the Big Eight's eighth all-time leading scorer.

Evans also enjoyed an NBA career, becoming one of five K-Staters in history to be taken in the first round of the NBA draft by the Denver Nuggets in 1978. He remained in the NBA for nine seasons, taking turns with San Antonio, Milwaukee, Cleveland and Denver, again.

Coach Jim Wooldridge's squad is not going to be accredited with the accolades Kruger, Williams and Evans achieved during their era. And Wooldridge most likely won't leave the mark Hartman did.

Still, Wooldridge was successful in bringing class back to the program, and these players have enticed fans to fill Bramlage.

However, after Saturday's loss, junior Cartier Martin is concerned the fans have lost interest. Kruger, Williams and Evans might be just what the K-State faithful need right now, he said.

"I think it's pretty big getting the guys back here and retiring their jerseys," Martin said. "Hopefully it will bring the crowd back — I know they're a little upset from the game Saturday."

After tonight, six men's jerseys will hang from the rafters reminding anyone who enters Bramlage that, win or lose, there is still tradition and prestige in the K-State basketball program.

K-State men's basketball jersey retirements of 2006

LON KRUGER

- One of 18 players ever to score 1,000 career points. He averaged 13.3 points per game.
- Earned Academic All-America and first-team Academic All-Big Eight accolades in 1973 and 1974.
- During his coaching stint at K-State, Kruger's 34-22 regular-conference record ranks sixth among K-State coaches, and his regular-season conference winning percentage (67.8 percent) ranks fifth among K-State coaches.
- Kruger was the first K-State coach to win 20 games in his first season.
- Kruger's best team was his 1987-88 squad. This club tied the school record for wins with a 25-9 record.
- During his K-State coaching tenure, Kruger coached one All-American, four first-team All-Big Eight selections and two Big Eight Newcomers of the Year.

CHUCKIE WILLIAMS

- Remembered as one of K-State's most talented long-range shooters.
- Williams made one of the biggest scoring jumps in K-State history — as a sophomore, he averaged 5.3 points per game and as a junior, he notched 22.1 ppg.
- Williams was named a Helms Foundation All-American twice and earned second-team All-American honors from the Sporting News, Converse Yearbook and Basketball Weekly.
- K-State's sixth all-time leading scorer with 1,364 points.
- Williams owned the K-State's single-game scoring record for 19 years with 47 points in 1975 before Askia Jones broke his mark in 1994.
- Williams shares the prestige of most points in an NCAA Tournament game with 35 against Syracuse in 1975.

MIKE EVANS

- Evans is K-State's all-time leading scorer with 2,115 points during his four-year career.
- Averaged 18.1 points on 49.2 percent shooting for his career.
- As a senior, Evans was named to multiple All-America teams, including the Associated Press' third team and the Helms Foundation.
- After six seasons playing in the NBA, Evans joined the Denver coaching staff in 1990-91 and assisted until 1994-95 when he was named Director of Player Personnel.
- Evans served as an analyst for Denver's TV broadcasts during 1996-97.
- Evans assumed the role of interim coach for Denver on Dec. 26, 2001, and coached for 56 games, tallying an 18-38 record.
- Evans is a now scout for the NBA's Toronto Raptors, where he was assistant coach in 2004-05.

Surgery causes Wooldridge to miss tonight's game

Assistant coaches temporarily take over for next few games

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After three-straight losses, the K-State men's basketball players find themselves trying to climb an uphill battle in the Big 12 Conference.

The battle became even tougher with Monday's news that Coach Jim Wooldridge needed to have surgery on a bulging disk in his neck.

Wooldridge is scheduled for surgery today, forcing him to miss tonight's game against Iowa State at Bramlage Coliseum.

According to a K-State Sports Information press release Monday, Wooldridge said he had been experiencing pain for much of the season, but it intensified in the last 10 days.

"The doctors have informed me that without immediate attention, this condition will only become more serious and permanent," Wooldridge said in the release. "I hate to step away at such a crucial juncture of the season, but I believe that I have to take measures now to correct these health issues."

After Wooldridge underwent tests by team doctors in Manhattan, he met with a neurosurgeon Monday in Kansas City.

The doctors' diagnosis determined Wooldridge was suffering from a "significant disk protrusion" at the C3-4 vertebrae in his neck, which caused numbness in his upper and lower extremities. Doctors also discovered a small bone spur at the C5-6 vertebrae.

Junior forward Cartier Martin said Wooldridge's absence is a setback, but the Wildcats can win without him.

"We've been working all fall and all winter," Martin said. "I think we can get the job done with him or without him here."

Sophomore guard Clint Stewart said he thinks Wooldridge's absence provides the Wildcats with motivation to play harder.

"He's going to get back as quickly as possible," Stewart said. "He told us, 'You have to come together. It's now or never. If you want to get to the NCAA Tournament, you need start winning some games.'"

Wooldridge's return — expected to be in one or two more games — will be dictated by the speed of his recovery and medical clearance from his physician.

Until then, assistant coach Jimmy Elgas will take over as head coach.

Elgas, in his sixth season at K-State, has never been a head coach at any level, though the 34-year-old has been heavily involved in recruiting a number of K-State's players, including Martin, Stewart and former forward Jeremiah Massey.

"We're going to miss coach (Wooldridge)," assistant coach Charles Baker said. "He's still on the phone with us all day talking about ways to win this game. He is not here with us physically, but the kids still know he's behind them, so we're going to try and go out there and get this done for him."

Coach Jim Wooldridge argues about a call and receives a technical foul during the Oklahoma State game. Wooldridge will not coach in tonight's game against Iowa State because he is undergoing surgery this morning for a significant disk protrusion at the C3-4 vertebrae in his neck.

Inside the injury

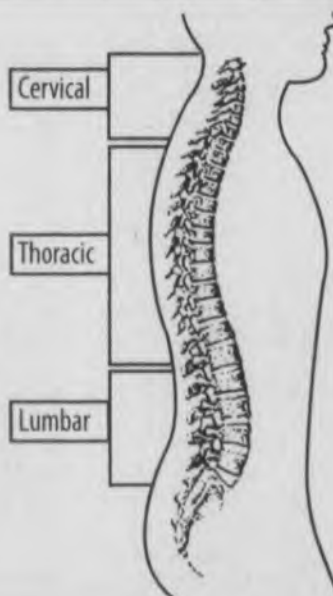

■ Coach Wooldridge is suffering from a bulging disk in his neck at the C3-4 vertebrae.

■ A bulging disk is an intervertebral disk that extends beyond its normal boundary, into the area where the spinal cord lives.

■ A bulging disk causes pain if it bulges onto a nerve (The spinal cord is all nerve tissue). This will depend on how far it is bulging and in which direction.

■ Bulging and herniated disks cause pain because the soft material flows out, usually onto nerves. The nerves respond by sending pain signals. The bulging disk is not always painful.

Under pressure

K-State looking to snap 3-game losing streak tonight against fast-paced Iowa State team

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball team is familiar with playing in close games.

Ten of K-State's last 15 games have been decided by five points or less.

Problem is, the Wildcats have fallen into a pattern of losing those games.

When K-State (12-7, 3-5) faces Iowa State (14-7, 4-4) at 6:30 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum, the Wildcats will aim to snap a three-game losing streak.

During the skid, K-State has lost to Colorado, Baylor and Oklahoma State by an average of 2.67 points.

For the season, all but one of K-State's losses were by five points or less, including a 72-70 loss to Iowa State at Ames, Iowa, on Jan. 7.

After blowing a nine-point lead in the final five minutes to Oklahoma State on Saturday, K-State spent Monday working on close-game, pressure situations, junior forward Cartier Martin said.

"We came in (Monday) and worked on taking care of the ball and time management," Martin said. "Hopefully, it will pay off in future games."

Iowa State enters tonight's game as winners of two of its last three, including a 96-79 win against Colorado on Sunday, a team K-State lost to on Jan. 28.

Against Colorado, Iowa State junior guard Curtis Stinson registered the eighth triple-double in Big 12 Conference history with 24 points, 10 rebounds and 10 assists. For his effort, he was rewarded Big 12 Player of the Week honors.

In the last meeting between K-State and Iowa State on Jan. 7, Stinson scored 17 points, and fellow Cyclone guard Will Blalock scored 24.

Against Iowa State, sophomore guard David Hoskins contributed with a career-high 25 points on 10-of-13 shooting, and Martin added 21 points. The Wildcats lost despite shooting 57.4 percent for the game and 71.4 percent in the second half.

However, K-State turned the ball over 24 times against the Cyclones — a concern for assistant coach Charles Baker.

"(Iowa State) really needs turnovers to be able to score easy transition baskets and beat you," Baker said. "If you take a quick or bad shot, that's like a turnover because those two guards (Stinson and Blalock) are as good in transition as any two guards in college basketball."

Taking care of the basketball this time around might help K-State defeat Iowa State, which leads the Big 12 in steals at 10.29 per game.

"The key is to still defend and take care of the ball," sophomore point guard Clint Stewart said. "Basically, we just have to come together as a team. If we want to go out and win, we need to work with each other and unite.

"If we can get everybody on the same page — if everybody is playing hard and playing well — we can do big things."

Martin, K-State's leading scorer at 18.6 points per game, failed to score in double figures for the first time all season on Saturday.

He said K-State needs a win to remain in contention for NCAA Tournament consideration.

"We have to be prepared going into this game," Martin said. "It's going to be a tough game. Iowa State is a good team, so they are going to come in here ready to play. We'll have to have good guard play and take care of the ball and attack them."

Despite recent struggles, Baker said he thinks it is important for the Wildcats to remain confident.

"To be honest, I think our team is past drawing positives from losses," Baker said. "I feel confident these kids can bounce back. Our team is good enough to beat people in this league, so we're going to make sure we go out and do it."

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Clint Stewart pulls up for a jumper against Oklahoma State's Jamaal Brown. Stewart said he thinks more than one player needs to heavily contribute for K-State to be successful against Iowa State.

Cats try for season sweep of Buffaloes

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Road games in the Big 12 Conference often are difficult endeavors for teams.

The teams have to deal with the aspects of travel, playing on an unfamiliar court and having little to no support from the crowd, but the Wildcats will have the added pressure of playing 5,430 feet above sea level in Boulder, Colo., against the Colorado Buffaloes tonight.

"We are definitely excited to go down there," said Boulder native and sophomore Kimberly Dietz. "Every Big 12 game is going to be tough, and we have to work hard for each game. Up there, it is definitely going to be harder because of the altitude."

Junior Claire Coggins said the Wildcats (16-5, 6-4) will have to be mentally prepared for the altitude change.

K-State at Colorado

When: 8 tonight

Where: Coors Event Center, Boulder, Colo.

TV: Fox Sports Midwest

Radio: Fox Sports Net-Rocky Mountain/1350-AM KMAN

"A lot of people say it is in your mind, but it's all in your lungs," Coggins said. "It's not game-hindering, but if you're not playing with the right mindset, then it's going to be tough on your lungs."

In K-State and Colorado's previous meeting earlier this season, the Wildcats dominated the Buffaloes (7-15, 2-8) by scoring 56 points in the first half in their 85-66 win in Manhattan.

Coggins said the Buffaloes' earlier loss to the Wildcats is something the Colorado players won't forget anytime soon.

"It's most definitely going to be tougher in Colorado," said Coggins, who scored 10 points against Colorado on Jan. 14. "They're really going to want to come out and try to beat us. It's never fun to lose a game at someone else's house by a lot, and that's what happened."

Colorado is 1-4 in its last five games, but the Buffaloes carry the eighth and ninth leading scorers in the Big 12 in sophomore Jackie McFarland (17.3 points per game) and junior Jasmina Ilic (15.8 points per game), respectively.

Against the Wildcats, McFarland registered a double-double with 11 points and 10 rebounds, and Ilic scored a team-high 14 points.

Coggins said the key to stopping McFarland will be taking away second-chance opportunities.

"We can't let her (McFarland) get a counter move after she makes her first post move and make sure she doesn't get second shots," Coggins said. "As long as we stay true to our defensive principles and stay on McFarland and Jasmina Ilic, we should be fine."

K-State is coming off a 71-64 win against Nebraska Saturday — a game in which four Wildcats scored in double figures.

Freshman Shalee Lehning said beating Nebraska and the fact that the Wildcats have already played Colorado will be beneficial for K-State.

"There are a lot of factors working against us, but at the same time, we have the advantage that we've already played them, and we know what they are going to bring to the table," Lehning said. "We're just going to come in and play our game. We are really going to come out these next games really focused and try to bring what we know how to bring to the floor."

Off The Court

with Kimberly Dietz

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's game against the Colorado Buffaloes tonight in Boulder, Colo., is a homecoming for sophomore Kimberly Dietz.

Dietz, a guard for the Wildcats, grew up in the college town of about 95,000. She recently sat down to answer some questions from the Collegian about her hometown, surviving in the Rocky Mountains, tunes and a few other random things.

Q. Which is better, Pearl Street (in Boulder) or Aggieville?

A. "Probably Pearl Street because I grew up there, and my dad's office is down there. I always walked to his office when I was in middle school."

Q. Why K-State over Colorado?

A. "When I came on my visit here, I just fell in love with the coaches and the players here. I guess they just kind of grabbed my heart."

Q. What advice would you give to someone lost in the mountains?

A. "If you ever see a bear, get big. Put your jacket over you, and make yourself as big as you can, because they (bears) are up there."

Q. What's your favorite thing to do when you go home?

A. "Hanging out with my family, because I don't get to see them that much."

Note: "The Dietz family will proudly be wearing purple and white for the game."

Q. Who is your favorite singer or band right now?

A. "I'm really liking Keith Urban. I really like country."

Q. If you were in a fight, which K-State player would you want to have your back?

A. "Probably Twiggy (McIntyre) because of her big muscles."

Q. Which McFarland (Jessica of K-State or Jackie of Colorado) is better?

A. "Of course, Jessica. She's my homegirl!"

Q. Have you ever had any encounters with a wild animal in the mountains?

A. "No, but my mom has. She was on a hike in the mountains and she saw a fox, and she had to climb down the mountain to get away from it. I guess the fox thought she was trying to get her babies or something."

Q. In a game situation, which K-State player wouldn't you want to guard?

A. "Marlies (Gipson) is pretty much a baller. She would probably dunk over me because she's got mad hops."

Q. What's the weirdest habit you have?

A. "I don't know if it is weird, but I do crack my knuckles. It's a bad habit that I have."

Players provide valuable minutes off the bench

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Not one K-State women's basketball team member ranks in the top 15 in the Big 12 Conference in minutes played this season.

Not one. It's the Wildcats' ability to have successful play from both starters and players off the bench that has denied them the prestige of being on the minutes-played list.

"I think our bench has done a really good job," freshman center JoAnn Hamlin said. "It's hard for Coach P (Deb Patterson) to have a starting lineup."

In Saturday's 71-64 home win against Nebraska, K-State played three players off the bench, who combined for more than 25 percent of the minutes played.

"If you run so long and somebody gets tired, you can go out and get a minute, get a break, a breather, and the person you put on the court, you're not concerned about," Hamlin said.

In contrast to K-State, the Kansas women have four players listed in the top 15 for minutes played. All four average more than 31 minutes per game.

Texas Tech is another squad boasting multiple players on the list with three — all of whom are averaging more than 33 minutes per game.

"Everybody's going to step up and play their part, and the good thing about it, is we're 10 deep, and we're pretty confident with who we put on the court," Hamlin said.

"Some of the other teams, they're only seven or eight deep. I think we can run our team longer. We're going to be more fresh later in the game, and I think it's going to help us in the long run."

Tonight, K-State again faces Colorado and Jackie McFarland, sister of lone K-State senior Jessica McFarland.

Jackie McFarland leads the Buffaloes in multiple categories including total rebounds, scoring and minutes played. She ranks seventh on the Big 12 minutes-played list, averaging just less than 34 minutes per game.

Jessica McFarland came off the bench against Nebraska on Saturday, played 21 minutes and scored 12 points.

She said, as a senior, she is ready to enter a game whenever Coach Deb Patterson calls, whether it's a starter or off the bench.

"I know all of us are ready, and we'll be there when Coach P calls on us," Jessica McFarland said. "There's been games where the players that turn the game around come off the bench.

"All of us have been doing a great job coming in for our team and trying to improve. We get out there and try to get our team a little something else."

The Colorado game marks the beginning of the last six games of the regular season for the Wildcats before heading to the Big 12 Championship Tournament in early March.

Sophomore guard Kimberly Dietz said the depth of the Wildcats' bench will help in those remaining games.

"The whole team contributes so much, and everybody can score, and we've just got a deep bench," Dietz said.

Junior Claire Coggins, who is averaging just slightly more than 30 minutes per game — the most of any player this season — said bench play is an integral part of the team.

"Our bench does a really good job, and that's a great thing because it's very hard to guard whenever other teams don't really scout a whole lot of people," Coggins said.

"Legs are going to be a big thing. Whoever can go 40 minutes the strongest is going to be the deciding factor in a lot of the rest of the season."

"The fact that we have a bench is really good."

She also said K-State cannot rely solely on its bench to get the team through the final games of the season and into post-season play.

"A lot of teams have benches, too," she said.

"Everyone has to come in ready to play — that's the deciding factor in winning games."

"It doesn't matter whether you start or whether you come off the bench, if you're not ready to play, then you're not going to win."

Crowd honors 3 former Wildcat basketball players by retiring jerseys during halftime of game

Mike Evans, former K-State basketball player, laughs with Bill Snyder, former K-State football coach, and Chuckie Williams, former K-State basketball player, after their jerseys were retired during halftime of the men's basketball game Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum. Evans played at K-State from 1974 to 1978, and Williams played from 1972 to 1976.

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before Wednesday night's game, Chuckie Williams, Lon Kruger and Mike Evans chatted, sharing memories and telling stories of how they wound up in Manhattan in the 1970s.

On Wednesday night, the former basketball greats united to celebrate their success at K-State, reminisce about what it was like playing under former Coach Jack Hartman and to see their old jerseys — 10, 12 and 12 — rise to the rafters.

When Williams received the news his jersey was going to be retired, he could use only two words to describe how he felt.

"Overwhelming, disbelief," Williams said before the game. "I'm very emotional. I'm gonna be excited, I'm gonna be thrilled, I'm gonna be teary-eyed (at halftime)."

Kruger echoed Williams' sentiments.

"It's really special, the opportunity to come and relive some memories is what it's all about," Kruger said. "I never thought once about this (my jersey being retired). I don't think when you're playing you realize there are days like this. I don't think anyone stops to think, 'if I do this, if I do that, this will happen.'"

At the half, Kruger, Williams and Evans were introduced individually at midcourt. Each gave a brief speech, thanking fans, former players and K-State for enabling the trio to receive this recognition.

"None of this would be possible if not for the greatest fans and students who traditionally came out and cheered on this university," said Evans, who played in 1974-78. "I thank you, Ernie Barrett, Jack Parr, Bob Boozer. I thank you, Lon

Kruger, Chuckie Williams, President Jon Wefald and Athletic Director Tim Weiser.

"Thanks for doing this for us."

The jerseys then were unveiled together, and Bramlage Coliseum erupted in cheers. After the ceremony, the three walked back to their seats in the stands.

It was the ceremony that brought them together Wednesday night in Bramlage, but it was on different terms, more than 30 years ago, that the threesome wound up at K-State.

Kruger, a Silver Lake, Kan., native, was the first player Hartman recruited when he came to K-State in 1971. Before choosing K-State, Kruger visited Drake and Wichita State for basketball and Kansas for football, Kruger said.

SGA members address state legislators

About 20 members of Student Governing Association traveled to Topeka on Tuesday to inform the Kansas Legislature of the importance of higher education.

"I think it was a very positive day for K-State and for higher education," Student Senate Chair Tyson Moore said.

SGA members get this opportunity once a year on Higher Education Day. The event is organized by the Kansas Board of Regents, and representatives from the other six Board of Regents universities also attend.

The student representatives from these universities divided into groups of two or three students according to legislative districts and made appointments with the available representative who most closely represented their particular district.

K-State had the largest showing of student representatives at this year's meeting, followed by Emporia State University. The three main issues discussed at the meeting were student health insurance, Gov. Sebelius' proposed budget and interest ownership.

Under current state mandates for student health insurance, all Board of Regents universities purchase student insurance policies from a business called MEGA Life and Health Insurance Company.

The goal is to combine all state universities, technical institutes and community colleges and purchase one insurance plan for all higher education institutions in Kansas. This would provide better coverage for more students and lower insurance rates, Student Body President Michael Burns said.

"Very few undergrads purchase health insurance, but it's a big issue for grad students," Burns said. "The opportunity to have more people on the plan will drop the costs."

Student representatives from the Board of Regents universities also urged state legislators to accept the annual budget recently proposed by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius.

This budget allows for an increase of 3.2 percent to higher education funding, an increase of about $42.2 million. The Board of Regents would receive an additional $20 million, which would be divided between the six universities.

Sebelius' budget also allocated $8.9 million for Senate Bill 345, which aims to increase wages for university staff and faculty members. This will allow additional funding for K-State priorities and also will help curb the cost of tuition, Burns said.

The student representatives also urged legislators to change the current standards

Local man faces drug charges

Manhattan resident Alonzo Hill Jr. was arrested Feb. 7 at 222 S. Manhattan Ave., basement apartment, on charges resulting in 10 felony counts.

Hill was arrested and charged with three felony counts each for sale of marijuana within 1,000 feet of a school, unlawful use of a telephonic device and unlawful acquisition of drug proceeds.

He was also charged with one felony count of criminal possession of a firearm. The firearm was a loaded .40 caliber semi-automatic handgun.

Hill's bond was set at $50,000.

According to a Riley County Police Department press release, Hill's arrest came after an investigation into the distribution of marijuana in the Manhattan area.

The investigation revealed that Hill allegedly sold marijuana on at least three previous occasions within 1,000 feet of a Manhattan public school, the release said.

Capt. Gary Grubbs of the RCPD would not comment on any subsequent investigations stemming from the arrest.

Hill's first court appearance is scheduled for 9:30 a.m. on Feb. 22.

Senate considers animal abuse law

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senate Bill 408, an animals rights bill, was scheduled for a vote in the Kansas Senate on Monday, but the bill is still in committee.

It becomes law, the bill would classify the most serious acts of animal cruelty as felonies.

It also would require offenders to undergo psychological counseling or anger management programs and would prohibit offenders from owning an animal for five years.

Kansas is one of nine states in which animal cruelty is not a felony.

Rep. Sydney Carlin (D-Manhattan) said she supports the bill.

"I am very supportive of doing something to stop the poor treatment of these animals who have no voice," Carlin said.

"These people are showing very aggressive behavior because it's against something that can't protect itself, and that's pretty aggressive."

Donna Davis, registered veterinarian technician in the radiation department at the K-State Veterinary Medicine Teaching Hospital, said she has seen the result of animal cruelty while working at the hospital.

"A puppy was brought in that was found dead," Davis said. "It had been kicked and beaten to death by the owner."

Davis said three kittens were also brought in with gunshot wounds.

"These situations are just really hard to see and deal with," she said. "People who do such horrible things to animals really have a lack of respect for an animal's life."

Davis said she supports the bill and thinks the tougher punishments might deter people from abusing animals.

"If these people saw a situation where someone was prosecuted with severe enough consequences, they may think twice before hurting an animal," she said.

Connie Ellis, vice president of the Animal Welfare Club, said she started a petition in September urging Kansas lawmakers to bring the bill up for vote.

"This needs to be brought to people's attention," said Ellis, second-year veterinary medicine student. "This is a sick behavior that needs to be addressed more seriously."

Ellis said she stresses the importance of rehabilitating those who are convicted of abusing animals.

"It's not just about jail time. These people need help," she said. "There is no point in putting them in jail without giving them the help to change their deep-seated neurosis."

Ellis said she has seen situations in which animal cruelty was suspected and said these situations put veterinarians in tough positions.

"Without knowing what really happens we can only speculate," Ellis said. "And it's our job to report it, but when the law makes it really hard to prosecute, a lot of DAs don't even want to pursue it."

Unofficial transcripts on KATS next step after fee elimination

By Larey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Unofficial transcripts are still unavailable for K-State students despite last week's announcement at a Student Senate meeting by Student Body President Michael Burns that the $8 fee for official transcripts was being eliminated.

After the fee was voted to be eliminated for students, Burns said the next step in the process would be to work with the Office of the Registrar and K-State technology coordinators to make unofficial transcripts available on KATS.

"A lot of different things need unofficial transcripts, and students would need them, so they would have to pay the $8 for the official transcript," Burns said.

An average of $1.50 per student will be added to next year's tuition increase to cover transcripts, graduation and Career and Employment Services.

Burns said he hopes the elimination of the transcript fee would be enacted by July. However, the final date is still being discussed, said Eddi Devore, public service administrator and transcript section supervisor.

While Devore said she was unsure why the university does not offer unofficial transcripts, she said parameters for the elimination of the transcript fee were still being discussed.

"Students must be enrolled during the time to make a transcript request for free," she said.

Devore said the number of official transcripts students request might be limited per day or per semester.

Devore said an unofficial transcript does not have the color-coated stamp and secure paper, which if faxed or copied, will have the word copy across the page.

Although she said she was unsure of the way other public universities deal with transcripts, Devore said K-State tries to stay in line with other schools' policies.

She said she was unaware of any other university offering free official transcripts to students.

Official transcripts will still cost $8 until the fee is eliminated later this year.

Devore said extra costs for shipping or faxing will still be charged after the transcript fee elimination takes effect.

"We want to be sure that students understand that the fee applies to the transcript itself and not for faxing or shipping," Devore said.

Megan Brooks, junior in pre-pharmacy, said she has had to use unofficial transcripts for scholarships she has applied for in the past.

Because K-State does not offer an unofficial transcript, Brooks said she runs a Degree Audit Reporting System as a substitute.

The fee elimination for official transcripts will be convenient, Brooks said, as she applies for pharmacy school next year. "I think that's going to be really helpful," she said. "That's what's been keeping me from going to the registrar's office."

V-DAY week to feature play

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Vagina Monologues will be a part of K-State V-DAY week again this year.

The play is at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday in Forum Hall. Tickets are $5 and all proceeds go to the Ali Kemp Educational Foundation and Comfort Women.

Rebecca Butler, graduate student in theater and director of the production, said the play is based on a series of interviews by playwright Eve Ensler, who then made them into monologues.

The play is a part of V-DAY, an international campaign designed to stop violence against women. Butler said the play is meant to empower women.

She said she had an emphasis in directing. She held auditions to see who was interested in performing, chose the cast and helped with rehearsals.

"I wanted the women to get into their character, but still stay with their individual personality," she said.

She said she was involved with last year's production and enjoyed the way the V-DAY campaign ran. She said the cast worked hard and said she looks forward to a great show.

"Men and women should go to the production because it sends the message that violence against women is unacceptable," she said. "It can empower anyone."

Zach Hauser, co-organizer of the week's events and senior in political science, said he got into V-DAY after one of his friends told him her story of being a survivor of sexual violence. He began to realize how many people are affected by this epidemic.

He said there will be a different take on the monologues this year, but it will still surround V-DAY. The point of the play as well as the events of the rest of the week, are about preventing violence.

"The play is about women, but is not exclusively for women," he said. "Men should be exposed to the stories of what some of these women have felt or are feeling."

He said that thousands of communities and colleges have participated in the V-DAY campaign, and it has had tremendous support.

"It will help them gain another perspective, and it's beneficial to relations between men and women and can help people gain an understanding," he said.

Self defense class offered at the Rec

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

TAKE Self Defense Course will be offered at K-State from 2-4 p.m. Friday at the Peters Recreation Complex.

TAKE stands for The Ali Kemp Educational foundation.

When an Overland Park woman was murdered, her parents started the foundation to make sure young women could defend themselves.

They have toured all over the United States with their program.

The Union Program Council is sponsoring the event, and while there is no cost to attend, they accept donations.

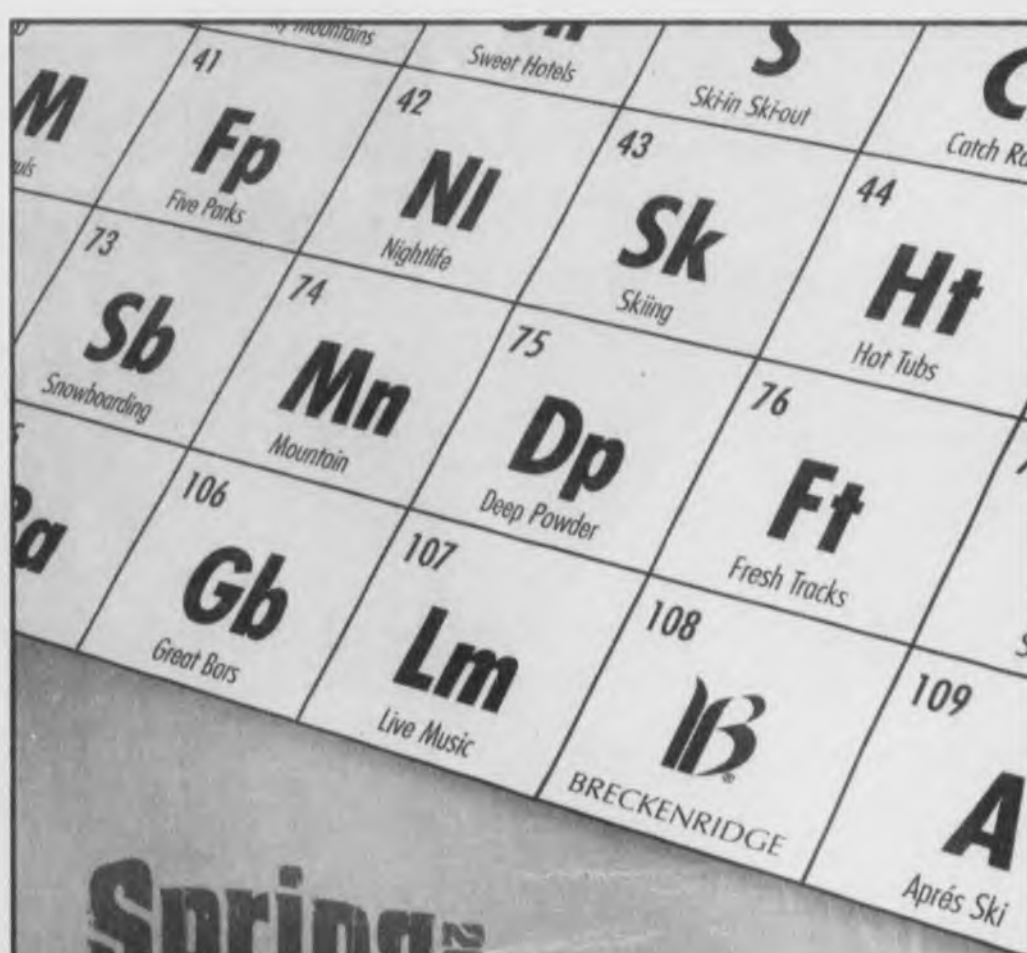

All proceeds will go to the Ali Kemp Educational Foundation.

"The course will teach ba-

Those wishing to attend can sign up in the UPC office in the K-State Student Union.

Also, you can call the UPC at (785) 532-6571, or e-mail at upc@ksu.edu.

TO THE POINT Transcripts should be easily accessible

A transcript is not just a detailed report card to be put in a scrapbook with a diploma. It is an account of one's collegiate academic experiences. Eight dollars each for admission to graduate programs is worth the fee, but not every application requires an official transcript.

Scholarship and internship applications often only call for unofficial transcripts. Review committees understand that students send out stacks of applications and the fees for transcripts would add up, especially when the cost of shipping is already on the rise. With hundreds of applicants for internships, most applications do not get returned.

Apparently, K-State is just now aware that the fee is an issue for students. Later this year the fees for transcripts will be eliminated and replaced by a $1.50 increase in tuition. It is a step in the right direction but not the complete solution.

This affects not only current students, but also alumni, students enrolled in the Division of Continuing Education and students studying abroad. To get transcripts, students either have to go get one in person or fax a request.

The easiest way to fix this problem would be to make unofficial transcripts available on KATS and offer online transcript purchases. Other schools have been doing this for years. We need to look at their example for a tested solution.

CORBIN H. CRABLE

To give you an idea of how long I've been here, I remember covering Drew Cobb's death in April 2001. Talking to his family members was one of the most difficult things I've had to do in my entire life. They wanted to know why their son, their brother, their nephew, would take his own life. They searched for any indication at all as to why he would commit suicide. To my knowledge, we still don't know why this tragedy took place.

As someone who suffers from depression, it was hard to cover Drew's suicide, the campus response and the memorial service – it wasn't because we knew one another. On the contrary, I had never met him before. I found it increasingly difficult to cover the issue because I, too, have felt the weight of depression for as long as I could remember.

I'm not ashamed to admit that there are times when I feel the stresses in my life are too much to bear. I sometimes cry for no reason. There are days when I sit in class and have to suppress the urge to scream.

And, often, I don't know why. I think I sometimes hide these feelings well, depending on whom you ask. But there are times when it's all too obvious, and it's then that I know I have to talk to someone.

Maybe Drew didn't feel like he could express his feelings, his anxieties and his problems to anyone, but this is the time when those who suffer from depression need their friends and family most – when they feel the situation is simply hopeless.

We need for you, our loved ones, to be there. Even if you can't relate or don't know how to handle it, just listen. Sometimes, all we need is a proverbial sympathetic ear.

There are too many students, faculty members and staff, too many members of the K-State community who deal with this silent torment alone. It takes courage to vocalize your sorrow to others, but addressing your problems with the help of those near and dear is better than internalizing your pain.

Talk to a parent or family member. Talk with your friends. Speak with a psychologist at University Counseling Services. Heck, write me an e-mail if you need to talk. Just don't inflict further pain on yourself and those who love you by ending your own life.

If Drew has taught us anything, it's that you don't have to deal with depression alone. There are resources available to help you in your journey to a happier life and good mental health. It's never too late to take advantage of them.

Concealed weapons pose too large a danger

In 2004, Gov. Kathleen Sebelius vetoed a bill that would have allowed Kansans to carry concealed guns. If she would have signed it, we would have joined 46 other states that threaten criminals from robbing random people. The funny thing is, I haven't felt less safe one single time since she did this.

ZACHARY ECKELS

Actually, I've felt safer than if it had passed. I would hate constantly having to wonder what was in the pocket of the person I just met. As long as it is illegal in Kansas, even if they are concealing a weapon, as long as we're in a public place, I know that they will at least be hesitant to pull it out. Well, either that or I really will have to piss someone off.

I have no doubt if this scenario were ever to come about I would have many gun enthusiasts skipping merrily around me singing, "I told you so." I can hear them pumping out line after line that the National Rifle Association has drilled into their heads. They are assured that they can never be proven wrong.

They do, however, provide some good arguments. It gets hard to argue with some of the ways they are able to arrange their statistics. Suppose, for instance, just 2 percent of the population was to carry handguns. Anyone who robbed 100 people would have an 86.7 percent chance of encountering someone with a surprise hidden in his or her pocket.

Well, if we stop there it's hands down – the world is safe and we owe it all to guns. War really is peace and we hippies smell bad and protest for nothing. Not allowing upstanding citizens to carry guns will only mean that bad people are alone in carrying them.

The truth is, 71 percent of murders by gun are committed by family and friends, according to The American Prospect. And an even bigger majority of murders don't take place during robberies; they take place during altercations.

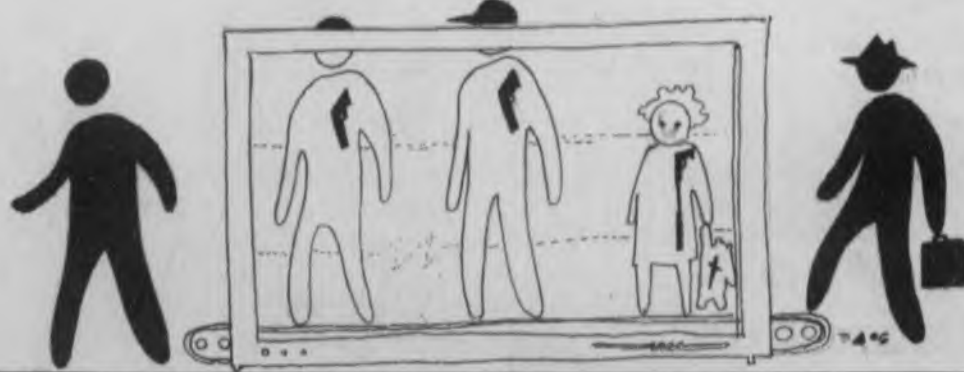

No matter how bad the crime situation in United States appears, most murders aren't premeditated. They start with a drunken argument or road rage. While these people may be law-abiding citizens 99.9 percent of the time, allowing them to have a concealed weapon during the 0.1 percent of the time they lose their head spells disaster. Even the most efficient background checks cannot predict the future.

There is a way to have our cake and eat it too, though. There is the possibility of allowing retired law enforcement officers to carry concealed weapons. These men and women have carried guns for their whole career, and I see nothing wrong with allowing them to continue to do so after they retire.

Criminals would still have a bigger shot at being stopped, and you wouldn't have to worry that the angry person in the car you just hit has a license to be carrying a gun. The truth is, too many things in life go wrong. People lose their heads, and it leads to stupid actions. There's already a bad enough chance in the United States that the person you're arguing with a gun. Forty-six other states have decided to fight fire with fire; we shouldn't make Kansas number 47.

K-Staters still must learn to adapt to being the minority in a right-handed world

By Lacey D. Mackey

Ashley Sanders, senior in education-social studies, is a left-handed woman living in a right-handed world.

The smallest things can be taken for granted, she said, even a writing utensil.

"Pencils are backwards," Sanders said. "If you want to read something on the pencil, it's backwards. I have to turn the pencil over to read it."

Sanders said she has learned to love being left-handed and has given class speeches about how her handedness is important, and how baseball is a left-handed sport.

"If you're the pitcher, you can see first base and home plate at the same time," Sanders said.

"If you bat left-handed, you're one step closer to first base, and left-handers should always be first basemen, because they can stretch out farther."

Although she tends to use her left hand for most activities, Sanders said she has always used scissors with her right hand and thought left-handed scissors looked odd.

Sitting in class can be a dilemma at times, Sanders said, but she always seeks out the few left-handed desks in a room.

"In my classes, I go right to the left-handed desk," Sanders said. "It's in the back, but I go straight for it. I don't like sitting in the back, but that's where the desk is."

Sanders said the Division of Facilities and teachers make her life easier, making sure she has the desk she needs.

"They do accommodate," Sanders said. "I feel special because I need a left-handed desk."

Al Seely, physical plant supervisor in the Division of Facilities Custodial Services, said about two left-handed desks are allocated for each general classroom at K-State.

"But they get moved around a lot," Seely said. "There's a problem with them migrating."

Seely said students can request left-handed desks from Division of Facilities, but a new tendency for long tables with chairs has made left-handed desks less necessary.

"The tables and chairs are more versatile," he said.

Stephen Kiefer, professor of psychology and director of the University Honors Program, said the idea of being left-handed or right-handed gives the impression that someone has to be one or the other, but both hands are useful.

"Left-handedness, people throw that word around carelessly," Kiefer said.

"We all use both arms. It's not like if you're right-handed, your left arm is limp at your side."

Kiefer said about 10 percent of the population writes with the left hand, but that number increases to about 17 percent if asked what hand is used for activities other than writing.

"Do you think the same number of people would say they're left-handed if you ask what hand they use to open a jar?" Kiefer asked.

Categorizing people by handedness might be misleading, Kiefer said, because most people use both hands for numerous activities.

"What happens is, people get forced into thinking that they're left-handed or right-handed," Kiefer said. "Everybody's left-handed. You still use both hands."

Some evidence suggests left-handedness might have genetic roots, but Kiefer said there are many instances of people with left-handed tendencies who have no family members who are left-handed.

"It's still something that has persisted," Kiefer said. "It just keeps sticking around."

Kansas Senate tables bill preventing picketing at funerals

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas Senate Bill 421 of the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee would restrict protests near funerals.

Debates on the bill within the committee were scheduled to start Feb. 7.

The bill was tabled in the Kansas Senate and will remain until someone picks it up, said House Representative Sydney Carlin (D-Manhattan).

The bill states that it is unlawful for any person to engage in picketing or a directed protest march at any public location within 300 feet of any entrance to any cemetery, church or mortuary within one hour before to two hours after a funeral or memorial service.

A violation of the bill would be a class B misdemeanor.

"There are two conflicting interests here," Carlin said.

"This is a situation where we have people as individuals who have the civil liberties and the rights to protest, and we have that competing with the emotional and ethical disturbances caused to the grieving families who are burying a loved one."

Carlin said the bill was complicated because of the different variables involved.

The bill will not be brought up if its constitutionality is challenged, she said.

"It's very difficult to get around because how can you write a law that takes these freedoms away from protesters," Carlin said.

"I have to agree that whether there is that right to picket and the right to protest which keeps Americans from being over run by some dictator. And I am very much in favor of those civil liberties."

Shirley Phelps-Roper, attorney for Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka, said she is against the bill.

"We are free-born American citizens, and we are interested in not losing those freedoms," Phelps-Roper said.

"Why would anyone want to give away the freedom that distinguishes us from the rest of the whole, round world? It's the brightest star in the whole Constitution."

Carlin said she did not agree with the recent protests at military funerals.

"It's very disturbing that any soldier or military servant has been targeted," she said. "It's a really sad situation."

Mende Barnett, funeral director at Kevin Brennan Family Funeral Home in Topeka, said he supports the bill.

"People who are mourning have the right to mourn in peace," Barnett said.

"They don't need to be further upset because one person's opinion is being expressed during the difficult time."

Barnett said she has not encountered any protesters.

"I would be very upset if anyone did protest because it would upset the families we serve," she said.

Fantasy game explores options

Graduating from college is the most important thing in my life right now, but along the way, I am trying to have as much fun as possible.

When I am not cramming for an exam or working at Village Inn, I enjoy watching television, hanging out with friends and going to the Peters Recreation Complex.

One of my favorite activities besides these things is playing video games. Together, my roommate and I have a Nintendo GameCube, an Xbox and a PlayStation 2.

My favorite game for PS2 is Madden 2006, and I love finding new ways to make the game interesting. Here is an idea I came up with, and all you Madden fanatics out there can give it a try as well — if you have nothing better to do.

I was at work one day, and my friend Trenton and I started debating who would win a game between NFL players who went to Big 12 Conference universities and NFL players who went to the University of Miami, or The U.

I argued that my compilation of Big 12 players could easily defeat his Miami players, and we found a pretty interesting way of testing this scenario. Obviously, watching this game live would not be possible, so we decided to create the two teams on Madden and let the computer simulate a best two out of three series at a neutral site to see which one of us could come up with the better roster.

I compiled a team of players with the likes of Priest Holmes (Texas), Dante Hall (Texas A&M), Roy Williams (Oklahoma), Roy Williams (Texas), Quincy Morgan (K-State) and Monty Beisel (K-State).

Trenton's team was anchored by Edgerrin James, Ray Lewis, Ed Reed, Santana Moss and Jeremy Shockey. We both had quarterback problems — the best one I could find was young Chris Simms from Texas, compared to his No. 1 option, seasoned veteran Vinny Testaverde.

The first game went back and forth but The U took over with James rushing for four second-half touchdowns and Lewis and Reed both coming up with key interceptions late in the game to secure The U's 67-51 victory.

The second game was pretty much the Holmes and Hall show. Holmes had more than 250 yards rushing, and Hall had two kick returns for touchdowns to help give the Big 12 the 45-31 victory. K-State great Mark Simonau also contributed with an interception.

So, you might be wondering who won the third game. Well, we haven't played the game yet, so I'll leave it up to you to find out who comes out victorious in the series.

This does not have to be limited to just Big 12 versus The U. Trenton and I play the Southeastern Conference versus the Big 10 and the Atlantic Coast Conference versus Pac-10, and there is always professional basketball with NBA Live 2006.

If you decide to try this at home, e-mail the results to me, because I would love to know once and for all which conference produces the best NFL players.

Cedrique Flemming is a senior in print journalism and business. You can e-mail him at sports@pub.ksu.edu.

Staying tough

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

BOULDER, Colo. — The Wildcats picked up their fourth-straight season series sweep against the Colorado Buffaloes on Wednesday, with a 67-62 win here.

Although the Wildcats (17-5, 7-4 Big 12 Conference) came away with their eighth-consecutive win against the Buffaloes (7-16, 2-9), the game was not decided until freshman Shalee Lehning and Marlies Gipson combined to hit 4-of-6 free throws in the final 20 seconds of the game.

"It's tough to come into their house and win, and the fact that we stayed tough toward the end," junior Claire Coggins said. "A lot of people stepped up tonight, hitting free-throws, making shots, and that's how we won."

Before leaving Colorado with a win, the Wildcats had to overcome dismal shooting in the first half and a 25-24 Colorado lead heading into locker room. K-State shot just 37 percent from the floor and committed 11 turnovers in the first half.

Coggins, who finished with eight points, said K-State wasn't playing its game in the first half.

"We let them (Colorado) be a more aggressive team in the first half, and at halftime we just wanted to make sure we could get more boards and not be passive on the offensive end," Coggins said.

The Wildcats opened the second half by going on a 14-6 run behind the three-point shooting of Coggins and sophomore Kimberly Dietz to regain the lead 39-31.

Dietz, who scored a team-high 12 points on 4-of-8 shooting, said the Wildcats found a rhythm in the second half.

"The whole team worked well," said Dietz, a Boulder native. "Everybody was hitting shots and even when we weren't hitting, we just kept pounding away."

Lehning puts Cats over the top

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

BOULDER, Colo. — Freshman guard Shalee Lehning owned the final minutes of K-State's 67-62 win Wednesday night against Colorado.

Lehning's 3-point shot with 2:56 remaining that bounced around the rim and finally slid through the net put the Wildcats ahead of the Buffaloes for good.

"She's a great little player," sophomore guard Kimberly Dietz said. "She's always hustling, getting those loose balls. She came through and hit those free throws and got that one big three to give us a little boost, and she's just a good player."

The three-point play was the beginning for Lehning, who had been held scoreless by the Buffalo defense all game.

She was quiet for more than 17 minutes, but Lehning made up for it in less than three minutes by scoring nine points, the third-highest game total for the Wildcats.

Lehning was forced into eight free-throw attempts in those final minutes. And those free throws played a pivotal role as Colorado began fouling in an attempt to slow the clock and increase its chances of making a late comeback.

"Again, there just wasn't an area of the game where down the stretch, Shalee Lehning didn't step up and make the big play," Coach Deb Patterson said. "She finishes 6-for-8 from the line, makes the big three, grabs the big rebound, so she was just everywhere."

Only one point shy of what would have been her second double-double on the season, Lehning was able to snag 10 rebounds, including one after a missed Wildcat free-throw attempt.

"The rebound off the free throw that Shalee Lehning got was as big a play as there was in the game at that point in time," Patterson said. "It was a big play because it was an absolutely impossible play to make. I know I'll watch the film 10 times and still wonder how she got that ball."

Lehning recently had trouble making free throws, missing two clutch charity shots against Texas — a game the Longhorns won in overtime. Since then, Lehning said she has changed her free-throw style, a change that has made her more confident at the line.

Freshman guard Shalee Lehning grabs a rebound against the Buffaloes. Lehning had 10 rebounds during the game and was 6-of-8 from the free-throw line.

K-State snaps losing streak by beating ISU

Junior forward Cartier Martin wanted to break out in a big way after posting a season-low eight points in K-State's 63-61 loss to Oklahoma State on Saturday.

His wish came true Wednesday night, as he scored 22 points and hit two crucial free throws with 13.9 seconds left, clinching K-State's 66-63 win against Iowa State at Bramlage Coliseum.

"I really did not think about it," Martin said of the free throws. "If you think about missing the free throw, then you will miss it, so I go out there and think about making it."

"Tonight I did what I had to do to help my team win. Against Oklahoma State, I felt like I did not contribute any. I was a little down on myself and a little

Martin, who is the second best free-throw shooter in the Big 12 Conference at 82.6 percent, finished 6-of-12 from the field, 4-of-7 from three-point range and 6-of-6 from the line.

With 1:27 left, Iowa State's Curtis Stinson pulled the Cyclones within two points by draining a three.

Not to be outdone, junior forward

Akeem Wright knocked down a 3-point-er with 55 seconds remaining to give K-State a 63-58 lead — it was Wright's first three-point make of the season.

"Akeem can shoot the ball," Martin said. "That was a big-time play, and Akeem is a big-time player."

With seven minutes remaining, Iowa State's starting backcourt of Stinson and Will Blalock had combined for 17 points on 6-of-22 shooting.

The Cyclone duo finished the game by scoring Iowa State's last 17 points, but Stinson missed a 3-pointer with about 0:05 left that would have tied the game.

K-State's win snapped its three-game losing streak, moving it to 13-7 overall and 4-5 in the Big 12. Iowa State fell to TURIN, Italy — Fast-changing events, including regional protests and the surge of rioting across the Muslim world, have complicated the task of protecting the Winter Games. The host city's police chief still believes security plans are flexible and thorough enough to avert serious problems.

Poli, a veteran of Italy's long-running battle against domestic terrorist groups such as the Red Brigades, said authorities are bracing for attempts by leftist and anti-globalization protesters to stage attention-getting disruptions of the games as they get under way Friday. On Wednesday, for the second time in four days, torch bearers carrying the Olympic flame through northern towns were forced to change their route because of protests.

MLB | Brown defeats Royals in arbitration

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — Emil Brown defeated the Kansas City Royals in salary arbitration Thursday and will get his request for $1,775,000 rather than the team's offer of $1.4 million.

Brown set career highs last season by hitting .286 with 31 doubles, 17 homers and 86 RBIs for the Royals, who had the worst record in the major leagues at 56-106. He made $355,000 and became eligible for arbitration for the first time.

He played with Pittsburgh and San Diego in 1997-01. Kansas City signed Brown in December 2004 as a free agent.

Brown's case was decided by arbitrators Margaret Brogan, Jack Clarke and John Sands, who heard the case Wednesday.

Houseplants bring life to any home, room

By Loni Woolery
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Houseplants offer benefits for would-be gardeners, said Katie Riniker, junior in marketing and student worker for Horticulture Services Garden Center.

They add color to any room and make the environment cheerful and inviting.

Riniker said she has plenty of experience with gardening and houseplants. For the last three years, Riniker was responsible for plant care and customer service at the center.

"Most of my knowledge has come from on-the-job training," Riniker said. "Last year I worked down in our greenhouse for about three months."

She said the center sells annuals, perennials, trees and shrubs. All plant material is grown by the company, except the houseplants, which she said are ordered from Florida.

The center carries a variety of houseplants. They are organized by the type of lighting conditions they need and how often the plants need to be watered, she said.

"Most college students are better off with plants that take low light conditions," she said. "These plants and more are ideal for dorm and apartment environments."

Most houseplants are easy to take care of regardless of one's lifestyle, she said. Most only need to be watered once a week because they don't dry out as fast.

"Also, fertilizing once a month provides needed nutrients for the best plant health," she said. "Other plants like succulents and cactus only need watered about twice a month because they retain their water longer."

Megan Greenway, garden store employee at Blueville Nursery Inc. and senior in horticulture, said the best low-maintenance plants are Chinese evergreens, pothos, zz plants and snake plants. These plants take the least amount of light and water to maintain.

The location of where to place the plant inside the house or residence hall room matters because of the amount of light the plant will receive, Greenway said.

"Anywhere near a window is always good," she said. "If it's completely cut off from light, it's not good."

Artificial lighting is available for houses that don't have adequate natural light, she said. It also can be used for larger plants and more ambitious gardeners who are trying to take care of various plants at one time.

According to www.gardenersnet.com, taking care of indoor plants is a great hobby during the winter months and throughout the year.

The Web site also explains how many houseplants grow slowly during the winter months. They can even go dormant from late fall to early winter.

In general, houseplants require less attention and maintenance than outdoor plants.

Prices for houseplants range depending on size and start as low as $3.99 and up, Greenway said.

"Houseplants are relatively cheap and the prices are pretty comparable across town," Riniker said.

There also are emotional benefits to taking care of houseplants, Riniker said. Studies have shown that houseplants are good for one's emotional health. They also help clean the air and add humidity in a room.

"When you add something living into a room full of inanimate objects it creates a sense of positive energy," she said.

Keg party makes perfect celebration of job offer

Ask the 5th year

MATT
Class of 2006

Well, "Fifth Year," do you have a job lined up for after you graduate in May?

It looks promising. I already have one offer with an engineering firm out of Kansas City, Mo. It is on par with what I should expect for not having had an internship. I should take it because it means I get to stay close to friends, and it wouldn't be too much of a jump to make.

I remember coming to K-State from St. Louis, Mo., without knowing anyone. That transition was hard, but living in the residence halls really helped me make a lot of friends quickly.

If I took a job in a city far away in which I didn't know anyone, I would have to make the same kind of jump as I did into college life, except this time I'd be jumping into a single apartment. It would be tougher to make friends outside of work.

That being said, whenever I do accept a job offer, I will be throwing a Job Kegger. Engineers usually get a signing bonus when we accept a job offer. I plan to use part of my bonus to buy a keg of premium lager and throw a party for all of my friends to drink for free.

Hopefully, this concept of a Job Kegger will catch on, and if you know a lot of graduating seniors, you get to drink for free the last couple of months of the semester as they all take job offers.

I saw this guy playing basketball about 50 yards away wearing the same exact Aeropostale track jacket as me. He proceeded to start a conversation with me 50 yards away and asked for my name. What should I have done? The whole situation was really awkward and strange.

Don't, under any circumstance, give your name to a stranger.

Two months from now, you both will be at a party, and he'll come up to you and start another conversation.

Or worse, he'll immediately go home, look you up on the Facebook, going through every single person with your first name if he has to, and then proceed to "poke" you. That's just a little bit creepy.

No, it is best to lie and say your name is Abby or something. Only give out your name if this person is a friend of a friend. But then again, we are all friends of friends, aren't we?

Carlos O'Kelly's collects canned food for community

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Carlos O'Kelly's Mexican Cafe in Manhattan Town Center is collecting canned goods until Feb. 12 through its Mexican food drive.

Customers who donate one can of food will receive $1 off an entrée.

Lacy Struckmeyer, manager for Carlos O'Kelly's, said this is the first year for a canned food drive at the restaurant. All food donations will stay in Manhattan food banks, Struckmeyer said.

"We are trying to get more community-orientated and get more of the community eating at Carlos," she said.

The food drive is part of the year-long project "Carlos Cares," which will provide food to local shelters in June and September, Struckmeyer said.

Struckmeyer said she did not know the exact number of cans collected, but the Manhattan location has collected several boxes of food. The Carlos O'Kelly's corporate office also donated canned goods, she said.

Since business at Carlos O'Kelly's is strong, a $1 discount for each donation is not affecting business revenue, Struckmeyer said.

"Since people are going to go out to eat anyway. They might as well help as well," she said. "It is a neat idea to collect things and keep it in the community."

Karen Healy, waitress at Carlos O'Kelly's, said the food drive has a positive effect on the community and on customers.

"Customers are getting a discount, and the canned food is going to area citizens who are in need of food, so it benefits the community as well," said Healy, junior in hotel and restaurant management. "It is a win-win situation for Carlos O'Kelly's and the community."

Keri Williams, waitress at Carlos O'Kelly's, said she has had customers donate four or five canned goods at a time.

"Customers are helping out in their own community," said Williams, senior in social work and family studies and human services. "Donating makes the meal cheaper, and everyone likes cheap meals, especially K-State students."

Carlos Cares

Where: Carlos O'Kelly's Town Center

What: March 22-April 30: For every customer who buys a kid's meal, $1 will be donated to a local organization that benefits children.

Nov. 13-Dec. 17: Customers who donate a free toy will receive a free kid's meal.

Free practice tests for graduate exams available for K-State

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kaplan Test Prep and Admissions is offering free practice tests for graduate school entrance exams from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday on campus.

Kaplan Test Prep and Admissions, a division of Kaplan, is offering to help students prepare for a variety of exams, including the LSAT(law), MCAT(medical), G M A T (b u s i n e s s) , PCAT(pharmacy) and the DAT(dental).

Students will receive their scores and a personalized analysis of their performance within a week of the practice testing.

Practice testing helps students get familiar with questions and test formats, Carina Wong, Communications Director for Kaplan, said.

"Practice is the most important part of preparation," Wong said. "The more students get familiar with questions the better. The practice tests also help alleviate the stress that comes with testing and helps students gain confidence."

Damian Flores, senior in pre-law, has taken the LSAT one time and used practice tests to help prepare for the exam.

"I would tell students to take as many practice tests as possible," Flores said. "I would recommend students sit down and take the practice tests all at once, instead of just practicing session by session. It will help them get used to how long the test is."

Flores also took logic courses that were recommended by the pre-law department.

"The logic courses at K-State are a good way to prepare," Flores said. "These courses help you get into the correct mindset, they get you thinking differently."

No matter how much students prepare, most students will experience stress on the day of the test, said Wong.

"Students can prepare as much as they want, but there is always that last-minute anxiety that comes with taking any high-stakes test," Wong said. "This (practice) testing helps students feel more comfortable with the different elements involved with (actual) testing."

Most students prefer to take practice courses in a classroom setting, but Kaplan offers online practice testing as well, Wong said.

The free testing is available to any students. Students can register by logging on to www.kaptest.com or by calling 1-800-KAPTEST.

Koby Ferguson, junior in pre-dental, said he hasn't started preparing for the dental school admission test.

"I still have a year before I have to take it, so I'm not too concerned about it right now," Ferguson said.

Kaplan Test Prep and Admissions provides educational and career services for individuals, schools, and businesses. Kaplan also provides preparation for more than 60 standardized tests in the United States and in the United Kingdom, as well as college and graduate admissions consulting services.

Students determine majors early

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Zack Cowger has known what he wants to be when he grows up for a long time now.

Cowger, senior in mechanical engineering, said he has had a flair for mechanics since he was a kid.

"I lived on a farm growing up, and I always liked taking things apart and putting them back together," he said. "I also was good at math and science."

It seemed natural, then, when he took a career test offered by his high school that said he could possibly enjoy a career in engineering.

Kelly Egdorf, sophomore in architecture, said she knew what major she wanted to pursue before she came to college.

"In high school I took some drafting classes, and I liked them, so I looked into architecture and really liked it — I could use my artistic side," Egdorf said.

Choosing a major is one of many decisions students have to make upon coming to college, but unlike the question of whether to party at a fraternity house or a friend's apartment, a student's major can have long-term consequences, especially in regards to their future career options.

"I started out in elementary education, but I found that I really missed the theatrical stuff I was involved with in high school," Codi Albright, freshman in theater, said. "From the very first class I went to last semester — a theater elective — I knew that's what I should be doing."

Albright said she originally picked an education major because she liked the idea of teaching, plus there was more job security than perhaps a theater career could provide.

"But when I switched (to theater) I was just so much happier," she said.

Job security is one of many factors that can be taken into consideration when deciding on a major. For some students, salary might be important, for others, challenging work and keeping busy is important. Job satisfaction, however, appears to be the overriding factor for many students' decision.

Many majors, require a hefty amount of dedication.

"A lot of people ask me, 'how do you do it?'" Cowger said. "The only way you can is if you enjoy it ... any engineering major is hard enough that if you didn't have some kind of passion, you couldn't do it."

Bruce Babin, associate professor in the Department of Mechanical and Nuclear Engineering, said he sees several different reasons students give for becoming engineers. Many, for instance, have a family member who is an engineer.

"In the industry, I found about 80 percent of my colleagues had a parent who was an engineer or scientist," Babin said.

Professor to conduct research in Europe

By Yiyi Chen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Emmet Wright said the thought of conducting research in Europe through a prestigious grant made his pulse race.

"I thought about it my entire career," he said. "I am looking forward to meeting international folks who have the similar experience."

The professor of secondary education has been awarded a 2006 Fulbright Scholar grant. The endowment allows him to research and teach about science, technology and the environment.

Wright will be in Malta, an English-speaking country, from March to mid-July. He said the University of Malta specializes in marine systems, which he once studied and taught.

"That will be easy for me to co-teach classes with them and do seminars and carry out the joint-effort curriculum development," Wright said. "I want to renew my interests in the marine system and look at the ecosystem in both terrestrial and estuarine area."

In addition to research, Wright also will co-teach an environmental issues seminar to address problems in Malta and Europe. Similar problems also are likely to be found in the United States.

"We will address issues of global warming, the degrading of marine environment after the Mediterranean Sea was under stress," he said. "We will also address the water quality issue and the availability of water, problems that we also face in the U.S."

Wright said his key objective is to create ties between professors in Malta and professors at K-State so faculties at the two universities can continue working together after the program recesses.

The College of Education is already looking forward to Wright's return. Dean Mike Holen, who has known Wright for 22 years, said the faculty is looking forward to the experience Wright will bring back to Manhattan.

"Professor Wright is our most senior and valuable faculty member," Holen said. "(After his return) he'll be providing leadership for faculties as they compete for grants and contracts from the state."

Improved Campus Grounds coffee shop plans to reopen

By Yiyi Chen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The Campus Grounds Cafe will be back for business in the near future, said College of Engineering Budget and Fiscal Officer Patsy Havenstein.

The new cafe has been relocated to a different corner of Rathbone Hall.

It is waiting for the completion of a new fire detection system and fire door, as required by the Kansas Department of Administration, Division of Facilities Management.

The fire door will separate the cafe from the adjoining building, Durland Hall.

"We'll install the fire detection system and separate the buildings based on the requirement by the state department," Havenstein said. "The fire code footprint designed by a fire protection engineer was approved on Dec. 29, 2005," Havenstein said.

The relocation of the cafe is to make way for the new Rathbone Hall lobby upgrade.

Aided by a $1 million donation by K-State alumni G. Rhea and Patricia Serpan, the new lobby will feature wireless internet and a study area.

"It's a place for kids to work together for projects, to mingle, to do studies," said

Mitzi Richards, Senior Director of Development Engineering at the K-State Foundation.

After the completion of the new project, the new lobby will be named after the Serpans.

Two memorial busts will be erected in the lobby to honor their commitment to the Changing Lives campaign.

Following the renovation of the lobby, the cafe eventually will receive a set of new enhancements, Jeff Smith, co-owner and the manager of the cafe, said.

Smith also said he is looking forward to the comeback with an exciting new environment and the customary fast service.

"There will be more tables, wireless internet, and interactive TVs," he said.

Randy Slover, K-State fire inspection director, said the alarm and the premises separation are intrinsic.

He said the alarm system serves as the precautionary device.

It can better notify the building and prompt quick response, and the separation of two buildings will prevent fire in one site from contaminating the other.

"It will be just a one-house business to separate two buildings," Slover said.

"The more time people have, the better off we are."

Playwright brings work to K-State

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Shirley E. Johnson doesn't take credit for writing her play about Harriet Tubman.

She gives credit to a higher power.

"It's not me. It's the God in me that gets this out," Johnson said.

"A Triumph of the Spirit," an original screenplay by Johnson, was performed to an audience of about 20 people Wednesday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

The play has been performed since November 1993 and covers Tubman's life from childhood to adulthood.

"Since I was a little girl, I have admired and wondered how this great woman did the things she did," Johnson said.

She said she was inspired by Sandra Campbell's performance in a play titled "Follow Your Dreams," about Bessie Coleman, the first African-American aviator.

Johnson had envisioned a play about Tubman but hadn't made any concrete plans when Campbell introduced her to as "the woman who does Harriet Tubman."

Johnson said the idea that the play is a one-woman performance is misleading, because others are vital to the performance.

The Black Student Union helped bring the play to K-State, said Akilah Mahon, junior in finance and BSU vice president.

Mahon said the play shows more about Tubman than what people perceive.

"She's her because of who she is and not just her accomplishments," Mahon said.

Johnson said with the death of Coretta Scott King, her play is important because Tubman stood for what was right.

"It's most important that we remember Coretta in the same breath," Johnson said.

Fossett's GlobalFlyer takes off in Florida without incident

By Mike Schneider
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. - After a white-knuckle takeoff, millionaire adventurer Steve Fossett soared out over the Atlantic in a bony-looking experimental airplane Wednesday on a quest to break the 25,000-mile record for the world's longest aircraft flight.

Fossett squeezed into the tiny cockpit, kissed his wife goodbye and set out on the planned, 3 1/2-day nonstop journey, taking off from the Kennedy Space Center on a nearly three-mile runway that is normally used by space shuttles when they return to Earth.

His plane, the Virgin Atlantic GlobalFlyer, is made of lightweight carbon fiber and has a super fuel-efficient turbofan jet engine with a very high thrust-to-weight ratio.

The takeoff was free of technical problems like the major fuel leaks that had plagued Fossett's nonstop solo flight around the globe last year and prevented him from taking off on Tuesday. Still, there were some hair-raising moments.

Two seabirds hit his plane during takeoff but caused no damage, and the aircraft lifted off about 1,500 feet farther down the runway than expected. The temperature in the cockpit reached 130 degrees at one point, causing instruments to temporarily stop working, before it cooled off.

"Takeoff was a bit scary, to say the least," Fossett, 61, said hours later in a statement issued by his flight team. "I had to use most of the runway to get off the ground. This was particularly hairy, as I couldn't have aborted even if I had wanted to."

The birds apparently hit the leading edge of a wing and the nose of one of the fuel tanks, but those spots are well reinforced, said Jon Karkow, flight engineer.

Fossett's goal is a nearly 27,000-mile trip, once around the world and then across the Atlantic again, with a landing Saturday outside London.

The 80-hour voyage would break the airplane distance record of 24,987 miles set in 1986 by the lightweight Voyager aircraft piloted by Dick Rutan and Jeanna Yeager, as well as the balloon record of 25,361 miles set by the Breiting Orbiter 3 in 1999.

Fossett in 2002 became the first person to fly solo around the globe in a balloon, and last March he became the first person to circle the Earth solo in a plane without stopping or refueling. That flight, also made in the Virgin Atlantic GlobalFlyer, lasted 67 hours.

Both that venture and the latest flight were financed by Virgin Atlantic Airways founder Richard Branson.

The aircraft has 13 fuel tanks under its spindly wings, which extend 114 feet tip to tip. Drag parachutes are used to help it descend from its average cruising altitude of about nine miles or slow it down from a top speed of 285 mph. At takeoff, the plane had 18,000 pounds of fuel.

Fossett will take power naps no longer than five minutes each and drink nutrition shakes while in the air. His plane is equipped with a parachute pack holding a one-man raft and a satellite rescue beacon, just in case.

Fossett went ahead with trip despite jetstreams that raised fears he might not make it to his destination, Kent, England.

"Mr. Fossett decided it was worth trying," Karkow said. "He'd rather be flying than sitting on the ground waiting for a good day."

White House provides wiretapping information to select few members of House committee

By Katherine Shrader
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. - After weeks of insisting it would not reveal details of its eavesdropping without warrants, the White House reversed course Wednesday and provided a House committee with highly classified information about the operation.

The White House has been under heavy pressure from lawmakers who wanted more information about the National Security Agency's monitoring. Democrats and many Republicans rejected the administration's contention that they could not be trusted with national security secrets.

The shift came the same day Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., announced he is drafting legislation that would require the secretive Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to review the administration's monitoring program and determine if it is constitutional.

It came after Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., chairwoman of a House intelligence subcommittee that oversees the NSA, broke with the Bush administration and called for a full review of the NSA's program, along with legislative action to update the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

She and others also wanted the full House Intelligence Committee to be briefed on the program's operational details. Although the White House initially promised only information about the legal rationale for surveillance, administration officials broadened the scope Wednesday to include more sensitive details about how the program works.

"I think we've had a tremendous impact today," Wilson said at a news conference as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Gen. Michael Hayden, the nation's No. 2 intelligence official, briefed the full Intelligence Committee.

"I don't think the White House would have made the decision that it did had I not stood up and said, 'You must brief the Intelligence Committee,'" said Wilson, a U.S. Air Force veteran.

When asked what prompted the move to give lawmakers more details, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the administration has stated "from the beginning that we will work with members of Congress, and we will continue to do so regarding this vital national security program."

Questions from Congress about the monitoring around House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., sent a letter to Gonzales with 51 questions he wants answered by March.

As part of his upcoming bill, Specter said he wants the FISA court to review the program to weigh the nature of the terrorist threat, the program's scope, the number of people being monitored and how the information is being handled. If the judges find the program unconstitutional, he said the administration should make changes.

"The president should have all the tools he needs to fight terrorism, but we also want to maintain our civil liberties," Specter said.

At least one Democrat left the four-hour House Intelligence Committee session saying he had a better understanding of legal and operational aspects of the anti-terrorist surveillance program, being conducted without warrants. But he said he still had questions.

"It's a different program than I was beginning to let myself believe," said Alabama Rep. Bud Cramer, the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee's oversight subcommittee.

"This may be a valuable program," Cramer said, adding that he didn't know if it was legal. "My direction of thinking was changed tremendously."

Still, Cramer said, some members remain angry and frustrated, and he didn't know why the White House waited so long to inform Congress of its actions.

Lawmakers leaving the briefing said it covered the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, Justice Department papers outlining legal justifications for the operations, limited details on success stories and some highly sensitive details.

The White House has insisted that it has the legal authority to monitor terror-related international communications in cases in which one party to the call is in the United States.

For more than 50 days, senior officials have argued that President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney were within the law when they chose to brief only the eight lawmakers who lead the House and Senate and their intelligence committees.

In a PBS interview Tuesday, Cheney said that if all 70 members of the House and Senate intelligence committees were briefed over the program's four years, "it's not a good way to keep a secret."

House Intelligence Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., one of the eight fully briefed, said he still knows more about the program than the rest of the committee. But, he said, "there is very little left to the imagination" of those members who attended the briefing.

Said California Rep. Jane Harman, the panel's top Democrat, "The ice is melting, and we are making progress."

While Harman continues to support the program, she said she remains uncomfortable with the administration's legal justification. Harman said she believes the administration should have used the court processes set up under the FISA law and gotten warrants before eavesdropping on Americans.

Wilson, Harman and other committee members want to hold hearings on that law to review whether it should be updated. Hoekstra said he was open to hearings on the law but said such a review has "nothing to do" with the president's program.

Senators evacuate to garage after alarm sounds

By Lara Jakes Jordan
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — At least nine senators were among 200 people herded into a Capitol parking garage Wednesday night after a security sensor indicated the presence of a nerve agent in their office building.

Later tests proved negative.

"Test results have been cleared and all test results are negative, so that's very good news," Capitol Police Sgt. Kimberly Schneider said.

The all-clear came three hours after an air-monitoring sensor indicated a suspicious substance in the attic of the Russell Senate Office Building.

It initially tested positive as a nerve agent.

Lawmakers, aides and other personnel were evacuated to the West Legislative Garage shortly after 6:45 p.m. EST as police conducted several other tests before concluding that it was a false alarm.

"We had this warning system work," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., one of those in the garage. "People in the building followed the directions promptly. There was no panic, no running, no upset or anything like that."

Police said none of the people who were evacuated to the garage showed any signs, such as a runny nose, of exposure to a nerve agent.

Schneider said she did not immediately know what triggered the alarm but said it could have been something as innocuous as a cleaning substance.

"One of the alarm systems that tests air quality went off with a positive reading, and then it went off again with a positive reading, so I guess they thought it was serious enough that they had to take very aggressive action," Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., another of the senators evacuated from the building, said while speaking on a cell phone from the garage.

Gregg said everyone was eager to go home but understood the need for the delay.

"I started out flying in Air Force One and ended up in the garage with 200 of my closest friends," he said. Earlier in the day, Gregg accompanied President Bush on a brief visit to New Hampshire.

A spokesman for Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., said people tried to leave the area but police directed them into the underground parking garage across the street.

There, police distributed water and gave regular updates.

"Everybody was in a fine mood. Everybody was calm," the spokesman, Kyle Downey, said. "Everybody's been up here for a few years now. What does panic get you anyway?"

In addition to Sessions, Gregg and Thune, other senators known to have been in the garage were Mike Enzi, R-Wyo.; Gordon Smith, R-Ore.; Richard Burr, R-N.C.; Larry Craig, R-Idaho; Chuck Hagel, R-Neb.; and Christopher Dodd, D-Conn.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said the alert was prompted by a single sensor and that no suspicious chemicals were found.

"Everybody is safe. This was a false alarm," Frist, a surgeon, said shortly after the all-clear. "I'm sure tomorrow there will be a lot of questions about whether we had to be quarantined, and the answer to that is yes."

In February 2004, the deadly poison ricin was found in Frist's office, and while dozens of Capitol employees were quarantined briefly and decontaminated, none got sick.

In October 2001, a month after the terrorist attacks, an anthrax-laced letter shut down Congress briefly and closed the Hart Senate Office Building for months of cleaning.

Five people were killed and 17 sickened after coming into contact with letters containing anthrax.

Google's new search feature seeks access to personal computers

By Michael Liedike
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN FRANCISCO — Google Inc. is offering a new tool that will automatically transfer information from one personal computer to another, but anyone wanting that convenience must authorize the Internet search leader to store the material for up to 30 days.

That compromise, sought as part of a free software upgrade to be released Thursday, might be more difficult to swallow now that the Bush administration is demanding to know what kind of information people have been trying to find through Google's search engine.

Google is fighting the Justice Department's subpoena in a federal court battle that is focusing more attention on the risks of personal information held by Internet companies being turned over to outside sources, including the government.

Yahoo Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Time Warner Inc.'s America Online already have surrendered some of the information requested by the Bush administration.

All three companies have said their cooperation didn't violate users' privacy.

The ability to search a computer remotely is included in Google's latest upgrade to its software that scans hard drives for documents, e-mails, instant messages and an assortment of other information.

To enable the computer-to-computer search function, a user specifies what information should be indexed and then agrees to allow Google to transfer the material to its own storage system. Google plans to encrypt all data transferred from users' hard drives and restrict access to a few of its employees.

The company says it won't peruse any of the transferred information.

Once another computer participating in a user's personal network is turned on, Google automatically transfers the information so it is available to be searched.

Google intends to delete the information shortly after the electronic handoff and will never retain anything from a user's hard drive for more than 30 days, said Sundar Pichai, director of product management.

Despite the privacy concerns likely to be raised, Google executives are confident the product will appeal to many people wanting to use a home computer to hunt data stored on an office computer, or vice versa.

"We think this will be a very useful tool, but you will have to give up some of your privacy," said Marissa Mayer, Google's vice president of search products and user experience. "For many of us, that trade off will make a lot of sense."

Besides empowering computer-to-computer searches, the improved software allows users to set up an array of mini-applications, sometimes called "widgets," to monitor topical information such as weather, stock quotes or news stories.

Google's revision also enables the widgets and other information to be shared with friends and co-workers, continuing the search engine's efforts to encourage more of the social interaction that has helped draw more traffic to its biggest Internet rival, Yahoo Inc., as well as other sites like MySpace.com.

Responding to complaints about its earlier versions of desktop search, Google's update provides password protection to make it more difficult for intruders to access the software.

The package represents another building block in Google's attempt to create a computing platform to challenge Microsoft's Windows operating system, said Gartner analyst Allen Weiner. The package can be downloaded at <http://desktop.google.com>. The software will work only with Windows XP or Windows 2000 Service Pack 3.

"This is another way for Google to gain more control over the (computer) desktop and the consumer experience," Weiner said.

The computer-to-computer search feature could provide a stepping stone for Google to distribute a variety of digital media, including music and video, to mobile devices as well as other computers, said Greg Kelsey, a search engine analyst for the Kelsey Group.

Weiner agreed.

"I think Google has a clear vision and realizes that access to anything from anywhere is going to be pretty valuable," he said.

RETIRE | Honored players talk about camaraderie of former team

Former K-State player and coach Lon Kruger speaks to the crowd at Bramlage Coliseum during a half-time jersey retirement ceremony Wednesday night. Kruger is one of only two K-State players to be named the Big 8's Player of the Year twice.

Evans, who hailed from Goldsboro, N.C., was not heavily recruited. Dean Smith, then coach at North Carolina, invited Evans to North Carolina as a walk-on, but Evans wasn't keen on the idea. Smith tipped Hartman off on Evans, Evans said.

Williams, on the other hand, was heavily recruited by a couple of major universities but was confronted with improper financial advancements from those schools. His mother was a fan of Hartman, and K-State was a highly reputable school, Williams said.

"My mother just liked Jack Hartman - he promised my mother I would get a very good education here, but he couldn't promise her I could go to the NBA," Williams said. "I've done both, and it's been so wonderful."

They all agreed their time at K-State was unforgettable, but when reflecting on their respective tenures, each account varied on the most memorable aspect.

Kruger - who coached K-State alongside Hartman in 1977-82 and was head coach at K-State in 1986-90 - spoke mainly of the camaraderie established on the team in 1971-74.

"We had some great times here and built so many great relationships," he said. "You remember the games, but more importantly, you remember the times you spent with friends then, who are friends today."

Williams, who played in 1972-76, reminisced on the family-like environment Hartman created and how emotionally attached Williams became to the program.

"The first person that comes to mind would be Jack Hartman. He's the father figure that put us all together," Williams said. "The love that we have here, it's family."

He emphasized how important his relationship with Evans was during his college career and today. The pair grew up together, and their basketball careers overlapped for two years at K-State, Williams said.

"You can't describe the feelings that we have between the two of us, the emotions, it's indescribable," he said. "We have a lot of history. We grew up together - it means everything."

The only thing Williams said he would have changed during his stint at K-State would be the three-point line, which had yet to be implemented. Had it been there, he might be the No. 1 scorer in K-State history, Williams said.

"I would really hate to say it, but I would like to think I'd probably be somewhere up around the all-time leading scorer here," Williams said.

Robert Lipson - who started at K-State in 1972 and followed the trio while at K-State - agreed with Williams about how good the Wildcats might have been, had the three-point line existed.

"I'm gonna sum it up in two words - if we had a three-point arc and 35-second shot clock at that time, we would have won the National Championship in 1975," Lipson said.

Kruger, Williams and Evans weren't the only ones in the crowd with jerseys hanging in Bramlage. Ernie Barrett and Jack Parr - No. 22 and No. 33, respectively, in the 1950s for the Cats - showed up to pay homage. Kendra Wecker, No. 53, was there, as well.

Six out of eight retired jerseys were represented Wednesday night. When the six walked out Bramlage's doors that evening, the jerseys continued to sway in the rafters, a reminder of the players who helped build the foundation that exists today.

14-8 and 4-5.

K-State has defeated Iowa State five-straight times at Bramlage dating back to Feb. 21, 2001.

Entering the game, the Wildcats were anxious to end their losing streak, Wright said.

"We were eager," he said. "I think this gives us a little momentum, knowing we can close out a big game. We needed a victory really badly."

Eleven of K-State's last 16 games have been decided by five points or fewer, including the last four.

"If we can get a blowout game, that would be nice, too, but just playing in close games gives us confidence to finish them," Wright said.

Assistant coach Jimmy Elgas filled in for Coach Jim Wooldridge, who underwent successful surgery on a bulging disk in his neck Wednesday afternoon.

It was Elgas' first game as a head coach at any level, but he said he felt completely at ease in his interim role.

"I was comfortable," Elgas said. "We have played these guys before. I had a good feel for Iowa State. We were all confident in what needed to get done."

when it comes to interest ownership. When interest is paid on tuition and student fees, this money goes into the general budget rather than to the universities.

In 2004, Board of Regents universities could have raised an additional $1.4 million if the interest money could have been utilized for higher education, Burns said.

"We're not asking for an audit," Burns said. "We're not asking for anything different - we're just asking that the interest earned by us comes back to us."

The legislators' responses varied at the meeting, Privilege Fee Committee Chair Matt Wagner said.

"I know that a few people came back and said that they just couldn't get it through the head of the legislators that higher education is important," Wagner said. "And some of them said they were going to help us out and fight for us every way they can."

In March, student body presidents from the Board of Regents universities will approach the Higher Education Caucus, organized by the Citizens for Higher Education Inc. They will have another opportunity to touch on these important issues, Burns said.

Burns said he has worked with the Higher Education Caucus to establish this event, and while it is still in the preliminary stages, it probably will happen for the first time this year, he said.

SGA members are encouraged to follow up with their home legislators and to keep discussing these important issues, Burns said.

"I think the big question mark on everyone's head is 'how does K-12 and those issues affect what we're hoping for?'" he said. "I know I walked away feeling a lot better about where we're at on these three issues."

time was key for the Wildcats.

"We came in at halftime and just recognized that defensively, we were doing a fair enough job, but offensively I thought we let the tempo that Colorado prefers to play at (happen)," Patterson said. "We needed to play a greater tempo in that second half, and I thought our players did a great job of coming out of the locker room and committing to that. That gave us a little breathing room and a play on a Gipson jumper and would not relinquish the lead again.

Gipson finished with 11 points on 3-of-9 shooting and grabbed six rebounds in the win against the Buffaloes.

Patterson said she was happy with the way the Wildcats pulled together at the end of the game.

"It took us a bit of time before we put both (offense and defense) together, but what was really terrific about our play tonight was the complete and total team effort," Patterson said.

Local youth orchestra to perform at Carnegie

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A local youth orchestra will leave today for their opportunity to play New York.

David Littrell, distinguished professor of music, said the Gold Orchestra will be play at Carnegie Hall after submitting an audition compact disc.

"The company that selected us brings in choirs, bands and orchestras from around the U.S.," Littrell said.

The Gold Orchestra was founded by Littrell in 1989. It is made up of 58 individuals in grades five through 10, including the daughter of Soontae An, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications. The orchestra traveled to New York to play Carnegie Hall in May 2001.

This will be a new experience for most of the orchestra. There are only a few members who are still involved with the orchestra since the 2001 trip, Littrell said.

"Most of these kids haven't been to New York," he said. "There may even be some children who have never flown before. It'll be a great new experience for everyone."

The orchestra will perform several selections, including "Borrowed Freedom," which was written for the Gold Orchestra by Laurel Littrell, head of general information services for Hale Library. The orchestra performed a send-off concert Feb. 7 at McCain Auditorium.

Littrell said although the group has traveled extensively, this will stick in the orchestra members' memories.

"The Gold Orchestra has been to England, where they performed in Bath, Warwick and London; and in Chicago, Dallas and Seattle," he said. "Obviously, this will be one of the most exciting."

Kristin Mortenson, instructor of music theory, performed in Carnegie Hall several years ago with the Baton Rouge Symphony in Baton Rouge, La. She said the experience was memorable.

"It was amazing," she said. "The acoustics in the building produce a beautiful sound. Everyone arises to the occasion because it's Carnegie Hall."

"Just knowing that you're standing on the same stage that many famous violinists made their debut is awe-inspiring."

Mortenson said she teaches four students who will perform with the orchestra. She said it is interesting for her to hear her students play.

"It's the most famous hall," she said. "It's really exciting to get to see your students play there."

KSU Telefund volunteers gather donations

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Volunteer callers from the College of Agriculture set a new record in donations Wednesday evening at Telefund 2006.

Gordon Dowell, KSU Foundation director of annual giving, said pledges from alumni of the College of Agriculture reached $204,275, and the college still had one night of calling remaining. Totals from College of Agriculture alumni made up almost 24 percent of money raised so far.

After Wednesday's session, Telefund 2006 had received 12,135 pledges totaling $853,819.

With the theme CSI: K-State, Telefund has been in progress since Jan. 22 and will continue until Feb. 20.

Dowell said that over the past 27 years, Telefund and its student-driven, alumni-supported campaign has generated more than $20 million for scholarships and educational programs. Therefore, K-State has the highest alumni participation rate in the Big 12 Conference and the second highest in the nation, he said.

Other universities and schools have knowledge of K-State's success in Telefund. Many representatives visit during sessions to see how it operates and try to begin their own version of it, Dowell said.

Students from each of the nine colleges at K-State volunteered to call alumni from their college. Each college is assigned certain evenings during which to call.

A group of students from K-State Salina will have a night to call during Telefund as well.

"K-State-Salina has held its own calling session with cell phones in the past," said Kristin Magette, K-State-Salina coordinator for public and alumni relations. "But we'd been looking for ways to take our participation up a notch, so we thought we'd take it to Manhattan this year."

Magette said she is planning to bring 18 volunteer students to the calling center at the KSU Foundation on Feb. 15.

Dennis Kuhlman, Dean of Technology and Aviation, Salina, will travel with the students.

"(Dean Kuhlman) has always been involved with our Telefund," Magette said. "so he was really excited to come along to Manhattan this year."

Craig Pringle, senior in agriculture education, participated in Telefund for the second time. Pringle received a $1,000 pledge Tuesday night from an alumna of the College of Agriculture.

"I didn't have to pry at all," Pringle said. "She had donated in the past and knew what I was doing. I could tell she'd been called for Telefund before."

Money raised during Telefund goes directly to each college for their designated uses.

Cara Richardson, events director for the College of Human Ecology, said the money her college receives goes toward several purposes.

"Forty-eight percent of it goes to scholarships," she said. "The rest of the money is divided between educational material, faculty development, student projects, and alumni and recruitment purposes."

Over the course of each evening, a scoreboard in the calling center displays updated total dollars pledged. Data entry specialists were in charge of keeping current balances for the evening.

Heather Mitzner, sophomore in interior architecture, was a data entry specialist for the second year in a row. She said she enjoys the atmosphere of Telefund.

"It's really cool to see how different colleges act," Mitzner said. "Sometimes it gets really loud and exciting in here."

Dowell said he thought Telefund was a very rewarding experience for those students who were willing to participate.

"The concept of calling strangers and asking them to share their wealth is intimidating," he said, "but the combination of supportive alumni and a fast-paced, festive, 'rock and roll' atmosphere create an environment that is effective, efficient and fun."

Some colleges did not produce the immediate results that were anticipated from them.

Dowell said during the first week of calling, the College of Education and the College of Business Administration only occupied about 60 percent of the phones. He said he thought nicer weather and publicity for Telefund were both factors in the decreased participation.

However, he said high goals were still attainable for those colleges. The College of Business Administration came within $7,000 of last year's amount and the College of Education came within $13,000.

"These colleges are positioned to establish new pledge marks based on upcoming contacts with their alumni," Dowell said. "They're behind where they were at this time last year, but they're not done."

The final calling session Feb. 20 will offer an opportunity for colleges to reach any alumni who hadn't been reached during previous allotted sessions.

As extra incentive and reward for volunteers, donated prizes are given to participants at the end of their session.

Student fee bond surplus proposals due by 4 p.m.

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Proposals for the $1.5 million student fee bond surplus are due by 4 p.m. today in the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

Student Body President Michael Burns said there have been eight proposals submitted thus far. Burns said he expects about 25 total proposals to be submitted by the day's end.

"We encourage anyone who is proposing to benefit student life to submit a proposal," he said.

According to the Student Fee Bond Surplus proposal guidelines, K-State students have been paying off bonds used to pay for student-centered expansion and enhancement projects. As a result, a large reserve has accumulated in the surplus account.

All students, faculty and staff members, student organizations and university departments at K-State are eligible to submit proposals. According to proposal guidelines, project proposals must benefit the entire student body and require a one-time allocation of less than or equal to $1.5 million.

All project coordinators will receive notification of their application status Monday. During the week of Feb. 20, the coordinators of selected pre-proposals will give presentations to the Student Fee Bond Surplus Committee.

The committee will announce the recommendation report of proposals to the public March 1.

Student Body Vice President Grant Groene said interested students should submit proposals since they are only two to four pages.

For the love of farming

2 students find occupation, love of their lives through ties to agricultural backgrounds

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Kati Neil and Justin Bolte met more than two years ago, it was love at first sight, Neil said.

The couple locked eyes during the 2003 annual North Central Region Collegiate 4H convention, which took place in Ames, Iowa, that year.

Bolte transferred from the University of Nebraska at Lincoln to K-State in spring 2005 so the couple could be together, and in keeping with tradition, they became engaged at the same Collegiate 4H convention the following year.

For Neil and Bolte, both seniors in animal sciences and industries, this was an ideal and fitting romantic scenario. Agriculture has been a part of both of their lives for as long as they can remember.

"I grew up on a farm and I always knew that it was going to be part of my life forever," Neil said.

Neil grew up on a 2,000-acre farm in Fort Scott, Kan. The family has about 250 head of cattle, raises pigs, grows a few crops and does forage production.

Bolte also was raised on a farm, which was a 1,000-acre bean and corn operation outside of McCool Junction, Neb. The family also has about 100 head of cattle and raised other livestock such as sheep, pigs and horses during Bolte's 4H years, he said.

Both Neil and Bolte enjoy helping their parents at home and alternate their weekends between farming in McCool, farming in Fort Scott and relaxing at home in Manhattan, Bolte said.

The couple will be married June 24, and will probably spend the summer working on Neil's farm together. An unusual fact about the wedding ceremony is that Bolte, who learned to sew in 4H, is crafting his bride's wedding dress himself.

"We made it together, but he has the expertise," Neil said.

Neil works for Duane Davis, professor of animal sciences and industries, who is an animal science reproductive physiologist for pigs. She does everything from artificially inseminating pigs to helping graduate students with academic projects, she said.

Bolte also has an agriculture-related job, working with the K-State Cow and Calf Unit in the Department of Animal Science and Industry.

Neil is president of the K-State Block and Bridle Club, vice-president of North Central Region Collegiate 4H and has been involved in the Little American Royal livestock show for the past two years. She also is a member of Alpha Zeta and Gamma Sigma Delta.

Bolte is president of the North Central Region Collegiate 4H and also serves as president of the Collegian 4H National Action Board until Feb. 23. He also is involved with the K-State Block and Bridle club and the K-State College of Agriculture Council.

"They're very involved throughout the college," said Christine Soukup, senior in animal science and agricultural economics.

"They're great people and I think their story's really neat."

The couple will graduate from K-State in May and both have applied for graduate school. They hope to one day return to Fort Scott and have a farm of their own, Neil said.

"I'm excited to see where I'll be in a few years in the ag industry," she said. "I have those people I look up to and hopefully I can be there someday."

Senate approves statutes amendments for funding regulations

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate passed statutes amendments to the Student Activity Fee Funding Regulations at its meeting Thursday night.

According to the Travel section of the Funding Statute of Student Activity Fee Funding Regulations, students may receive up to a maximum of $100 in a fiscal year with each campus organization they are a part of requesting travel funds.

Students can receive the maximum $100 for one group but can still qualify for another $100 with another organization that they are involved with.

Allocations Chair Dave Hart said there was unclear wording in the Student Activity Fee Funding Regulations before changes were made. One reason for the change was to allow more students in an organization to receive funding for travel, Hart said.

"They were necessary changes that needed to occur after the audit at the beginning of this fiscal year," he said. "(The bill) will make regulations more consistent."

While the bill was passed, ten senators voted against the bill.

During negative debate, Sen. Tim Weninger said the bill could possibly limit funding for club and organization members. If a club attends a regional competition or meeting and members receive $100 for travel expenses, the same members could not receive an additional $100 for a national competition or meeting, he said.

Weninger said committees exist to make decisions regarding how much funding an organization or club would receive.

"If you make it legislation and put the wording in there, it diverts the process of committees," Weninger said. "Leave the wording vague, and let the (allocations) committee decide."

College Council Allocations Chair Anthony Carter said the bill will ensure a fair process for years to come.

"We are trying to make it a fair and equal opportunity for everyone across the board," Carter said. "We are trying to make sure everyone in the groups are benefiting, not just the officers."

TO THE POINT Telefund help important for university

Each year, students are asked to volunteer their time to assist with the Telefund and raise some money for scholarships and educational programs.

However, not everyone is doing their part to make sure Telefund can be successful.

For example, during the first week of calling there was a night when there were empty seats.

Who do we blame when something like this happens? Do we blame the colleges because they didn't advertise it well? Do we blame the students for not being educated about the Telefund?

Regardless of who is at fault, students and faculty alike need to do a better job of participating and promoting something that only does good for the university.

In fact, Telefund is so successful that other universities come to watch how we do it.

Plus, there are snacks, giveaways and even a chance to win a brand new truck.

Although it may seem weird to call up complete strangers and ask them for money, it's really not that bad when you look at the whole picture.

Telefund is a great service to this university and we need to carry on the tradition of being something that other universities look up to.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Not so scary movies

Good horror movies a rare find these days

A blonde, voluptuous teenage girl steps out of her broken-down car, somewhere on a deserted highway at 3 a.m.

"Hello?" she calls out into the nothingness. "Can somebody help me?"

It's really hot out on highways in the wee hours of the morning, so she strips down to her pink lingerie. Suddenly, a masked man pops out from behind the car, wielding a knife. After a long, drawn out chase around the vehicle, the big scary man wins, slices the girl like carved ham, and leaves her bloody carcass for her football-player boyfriend to find.

Quick, what movie is this?

A lot of them. Horror movies today have lost that blood-chilling, grip-your-boyfriend's-hand until-he-whimpers appeal. Many of them revolve around sex, cleavage and breathing hard while peeking around corners.

I believe it all started in the days of the "Scream" trilogy, "I Know What You Did Last Summer" and "Urban Legends." All classically irritating scary movies. Plenty of blood and gore, but very little substance.

The only exceptions I have found recently were Saw I and II, both of which rocked my face off. They were amazing, simply because they played with you. They led you to think you knew what was going on, then bam — turned it upside down. That's what I want in a scary movie.

Unlike comedies, which seem to be constantly finding new material to make me watch over and over, today's horror movies generally find me leaving the theater feeling cheated. Where are the unexpected twists that make me afraid to turn out the light at night? I need to believe somebody could be hiding in my closet to pay for a ticket.

I want to know what happened to the simple horror of the classics that made them classic. Every Alfred Hitchcock movie, especially "Psycho" and "The Birds," scared the crap out of me. Not because of what they showed, but what they didn't. After watching the latter, I actually was scared to go outside for a period time.

Granted, I was around 8 years old, but it's still quite an effect.

"Carrie" is another example of a great horror movie, because of that gut-wrenching feeling at the look of the pig blood dripping off her. Nobody's head was sliced off, and she wasn't a popular cheerleader — I loved it.

A great example of an absolutely awful-looking movie is one I saw a preview for a short time ago. True, it is only a preview, and perhaps the actual movie will blow me away, but from the looks of it, I doubt it. This movie is none other than "When A Stranger Calls," a remake of a classic from 1975.

A young girl is baby-sitting, a stranger makes threatening calls, gets in the house, steals the kids — you get the picture.

Anyway, the best part for me is the police telling the girl, who has just told them she can see the guy outside: it doesn't matter as long as he doesn't get in. Great police work, just sit back and eat a doughnut while this guy thinks of clever ways to break in. Can't wait to see it.

Perhaps it is all a circular trend, and eventually the world will right itself again and actual thought-provoking horror movies will become popular. Until then, I'll just amuse myself watching "Pink Panther."

Columnist's dream reveals meaning of life

A few nights ago, I had a dream I feel obligated to share.

I had just gotten to the library to study for one of my classes. After going inside, I picked up a copy of the Collegian on my way past the reception desk.

I went to an open computer to check my e-mail. I found spam about cheap deals for Microsoft Office and Cialis. I already have one, and I don't need the other — I'll let you decide which.

Disappointed that no one had sent me an e-mail saying I was the coolest person in the world, I left the computer and went to an open table to see what my fellow Collegian writers had to say — a daily ritual.

As I was sitting there, reading the paper, I noticed this girl reading a book a few tables away. I thought nothing of it; it was just an observation.

Later, however, I noticed she had packed up her stuff and started walking away, but she had left without her book. I went over to the table to pick it up so I could give it to her, but when I turned toward her direction, she had disappeared.

It was as if she vanished into thin air. Maybe she found that wormhole I've been looking for.

Anyway, I thought it was peculiar that the book had no title, no illustration and no author. I had to judge it by its contents, and not its cover.

I thumbed through it and found it incredibly boring toward the beginning. All it was about was this baby who grew up into a child and then into an adolescent. He thought junior high was the worst period of his life.

I finally found it somewhat interesting in the 16th chapter. The kid was in gym class one day and he got a little "excited" after this girl had been playing with the drawstrings on his shorts. I laughed hysterically. Hormones are funny.

I flipped forward to the 19th chapter, and I felt empathetic for the kid when he experienced his first loss of love.

I was amazed by his immense gratitude that he felt for his opportunity to study abroad in the 20th chapter. His experience triggered a massive personal growth period that lasted up until the beginning of the 22nd chapter.

Unexpectedly, after I turned one of the pages, there was only one more paragraph. The last three quarters of the book were unwritten.

I read the last paragraph. It explained how this kid had gone to Hale Library to meet his group to prepare for a presentation for one of his classes, but before he saw any of his group members, he got distracted by an apparition. He stood in front of it for a few seconds trying to figure out what it was.

Confused, I looked up from the book after reading the last paragraph, and I saw some kid staring at me. He was studying me intently. He looked strikingly similar to me.

After a few seconds, he asked me, "What is the meaning of life?"

I laughed at him, and asked, "Who do you think I am?"

He replied to me calmly, "You're God, aren't you?"

I was amused by his assumption. Before I knew what was happening, words were coming out of my mouth. I said to him, as if by divine inspiration, "The meaning of life is whatever you want it to be."

I watched the kid reflect momentarily. Then, he turned and walked away.

I refocused my attention to the quarter-way written book and new words were appearing right in front of my eyes. I read as the sentence began to form, "The kid reflected momentarily, then he turned and walked away thinking about what he wanted his life to mean."

Week to focus on STD education

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sexual Responsibility Week, sponsored by Lafene Health Center, will offer a variety of activities this week to help educate students about sexually transmitted diseases and HIV.

The week will begin with members of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators selling condom roses from 10:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m., Monday and Tuesday in the K-State Student Union.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center and SHAPE adviser, said it is important for students to be aware of how to protect themselves, even if they are not sexually active.

"Regardless if a student is sexually active, more than likely they will become sexually active at some point," she said. "When they do, we want them to make informed, healthy decisions."

SHAPE also will host "Battle of the Sexperts" at 8 p.m., Thursday in Union Station. Students will be in teams and discuss sex matters and participate in different activities throughout the competition. Winners will be awarded prizes at the end.

Alison Filla, senior in public health nutrition, said it's important for students to be open and talk about sex and sexually transmitted diseases.

"The less people talk about STDs, the more difficult it is to prevent them," she said. "The battle is a way for people to have fun and be open to talking about sex and STDs."

The final event of the week will be the Dating Doctor on Feb. 21 with the time and place to be announced.

Pheasant Weber, president of SHAPE and senior in psychology, said this week is important because college students are at a high risk of STD and HIV infection, and education can help students make informed decisions.

"STDs and HIV infection rates are highest for people ages 16 to 25," she said. "That is college-aged students. It is important to teach the facts so that students can make informed decisions to keep themselves and their partners safe, smart and healthy."

Wildcat women set for 2nd matchup against Cyclones

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women are seeking their second sweep of a Big 12 Conference foe Saturday afternoon when Iowa State comes to Bramlage Coliseum.

In their first outing, the Cats defeated the Cyclones 73-64 on Jan. 29 at Hilton Coliseum in Ames, Iowa.

That loss to the Cats (17-5, 5-7 Big 12 Conference) was the second of a four-game skid for the Cyclones (15-8, 4-6) a streak that was broken Wednesday night with a win against Missouri.

"Iowa State's a really tough team," junior guard Claire Coggins said. "I thought they were really upset about the loss at their home that we gave them. They beat a great team, Missouri, and Missouri swept us. They're going to come in here real hungry, and it's going to be another team we're going to have to be ready for."

Cyclone Lyndsey Medders sunk nine free throws and nine field goals — including three 3-pointers — as she stole 30 points from the Wildcat defense last time.

Although she was the game-high scorer Jan. 29, Medders suffered a foot injury that has forced her to sit on the bench for the past three games. However, Iowa State's recent win against Missouri proved the Cyclones could notch a victory without their top scorer.

Coach Deb Patterson said K-State would have to be mentally prepared and ready to be aggressive to compete with the Cyclones.

Iowa State at K-State

When: 2 p.m., Saturday
Where: Bramlage Coliseum
Radio: 1350-AM KMAN

"They're coming off of a great victory without Lyndsey Medders that's so impressive," Patterson said. "They'll junk up their defenses, so they'll keep you on edge defensively all night long, and offensively, they're one of the most explosive and dangerous teams in the league."

With only five games left in the regular season, K-State is ranked fourth in the Big 12 behind first-place Oklahoma, and Missouri and Baylor, who are in a second-place tie.

"It's an honor that we're doing so well," freshman guard Shalee Lehning said. "There's still a lot of season left, and we've got some big games coming up. It doesn't matter how well we've done in the past, now we have to look ahead for the games to come. We've just got to keep bringing it and hope we can keep climbing up in the Big 12 standings."

ROW | Rowers take lead in academic success

Once again, the K-State women's rowing team has demonstrated that its aims for excellence encompass not only its athletic achievements, but also those in the classroom.

The team placed 45 of its student athletes on the Big 12 Conference Commissioner's Honor Roll, which recognizes student athletes who have excelled in the classroom with a 3.0 grade-point average or higher.

Phoenix Coyotes coach Wayne Gretzky knew about a gambling ring involving his wife and assistant coach Rick Tocchet, law enforcement sources who cited state wiretaps told the Newark Star-Ledger.

The Star-Ledger reported in Thursday's editions that there is no evidence that Gretzky placed bets, but investigators are looking into whether his wife, Janet Jones, placed them for him.

Gretzky has said that he had no knowledge of the gambling ring.

Law enforcement officials told the New Jersey newspaper that Jones bet $500,000 in recent weeks, including $75,000 in Super Bowl wagers.

Tocchet, Gretzky's friend and assistant with the Coyotes, was granted an indefinite leave of absence Wednesday.

SPT | ESPN names new MNF team, NBA voice

Monday Night Football will have a new broadcast team when it debuts on ESPN in 2006.

Mike Tirico, Joe Theismann and Tony Kornheiser will be part of a three-man booth calling the games on Monday nights next season, and Suzy Kolber and Michelle Tafoya will be sideline reporters. Kolber and Tafoya both reported from the sidelines for ABC during Super Bowl XL.

Al Michaels, who had been with ABC since 1976, is headed to NBC.

ESPN also announced that Mike Breen will be its new lead NBA play-by-play announcer, teaming with analyst Hubie Brown for ABC telecasts beginning Feb. 12 and including the NBA Finals.

OLY | 1st day of men's downhill training tough

Only the world's most cunning and experienced speedsters tame this Olympic downhill, as American Daron Rahivels and Austrian Hermann Maier showed Thursday during the first official training run.

The Kandahar Banchetta course is rugged, rigorous and relentless — there's no chance to coast, and there's no downhill like it on the World Cup circuit.

Rahivels, the last man to win a World Cup downhill at Sestriere in 2004, once again finished first. His time of 1 minute, 49.46 seconds dethroned the No. 2 finisher, World Cup downhill champion Michael Walchhofer of Austria, by more than a full second.

Rahivels was quickest through every interval in the first of three training days ahead of Sunday's gold-medal race on the 2.06-mile course. He owned the fastest average speed at 67.42 mph.

Maier crossed third in 1:50.73.

Gardner, Missouri have score to settle

I'm worried.

Worried that the K-State men's basketball team will lose Sunday to Missouri, whom Baylor embarrassed by 26 points Tuesday. And I'm not the only one. K-State interim coach Jimmy Elgas said playing the Tigers worries him, too.

"Scary," Elgas said.

"I have such a respect for this league (the Big 12 Conference)," he said. "Every team has good players. On any given night, any given team can beat anybody. It is going to be an absolute fight over there."

On paper, K-State should win this game rather easily. The Wildcats (13-7, 4-5) have a three-game winning streak against Missouri, and K-State is clearly the better team.

Missouri (10-11, 3-7) has dropped six in a row, starting with a 79-64 loss to the Wildcats on Jan. 21 in Manhattan. All of those were double-digit losses.

The last time K-State played Missouri, junior Thomas Gardner had trouble finding a shooting rhythm early in the game. He still finished with 21 points, but after the game, he blamed K-State for playing dirty.

"(K-State was) pulling jerseys, tripping, bumping when I'm running," Gardner said. "It was a little disrespectful, but it is something I have to take."

Gardner then offered an arrogant guarantee regarding the two teams' upcoming battle in Columbia, Mo.

"We'll get them back when they come to play in Missouri," he said.

Gardner, who leads the Big 12 in scoring at 20.2 points per game, has a score to settle with the Wildcats. Gardner was convinced a K-State player intentionally kicked him in the head after he recovered a loose ball at Bramlage Coliseum.

Of course, K-State denied playing dirty.

"There wasn't any dirt — we were trying to guard him," Coach Jim Wooldridge said. "I don't think so. I didn't see any of that. We don't teach that."

Point is, the Tigers lack discipline. Wooldridge, along with every other good coach, does not tolerate his players openly whining about petty fouls.

Gardner's previous trashing motivates confident Wildcats

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thomas Gardner didn't have very nice things to say about K-State after Missouri lost at Bramlage Coliseum on Jan. 21, 78-64. The postgame accusations ran wild, claiming the Wildcats had played dirty.

"(K-State was) pulling jerseys, tripping, bumping when I'm running," Gardner said. "It was a little disrespectful, but it is something I have to take. We'll get them back when they come to play in Missouri."

The time has come for Gardner, who scored 21 points in the last outing, to funnel his frustration from the previous contest, as K-State (13-7, 4-5 Big 12 Conference) travels to Columbia, Mo., to square off against the Tigers (10-11, 3-7) at 12:30 p.m. Sunday.

Senior Dramane Diarra said Gardner's verbal lashing only gives K-State more incentive to increase its intensity against Mizzou.

"We're going to play even harder, so I hope he's ready for us," said Diarra, who grabbed 13 boards in the Iowa State win. "We're going to come 10 times harder than we did when they came here."

"He's going to be tough on us, so we'll be tough on him."

Being a veteran in the Big 12, Gardner should be prepared for aggressive — not dirty — competition, which is a characteristic of the league, sophomore Curtis Allen said.

"That's what the league is known for. He's been here, he's a junior," Allen said. "Him talking and saying we're too physical, nah, I'm not worried about that. We're just going to play our game."

On Wednesday, K-State played its game against the Cyclones. Diarra's rebounds, Allen's seven points on 15 minutes of action, junior Cartier Martin's 22 points, junior Akeem Wright's defense and sophomore David Hoskins' 12-point contribution reassured K-State it has the ability to compete in the Big 12, with seven games left on the schedule, Diarra said.

"Nobody's undefeated in the Big 12 — anything is possible," Diarra said. "We approach the game differently now — we try to play as hard as we can, we don't worry about one mistake, we keep on playing."

"That's what we've been focusing on lately."

Lately, Missouri's game has taken a turn for the worst. The Tigers are on a six-game losing skid, the most recent being the 26-point Baylor loss on Tuesday. K-State can sympathize with losing to Baylor, but not in the same manner the Tigers did, Diarra said.

"That hurts, that really hurts," Diarra said of losing to Baylor. "But they lost by 26, we lost by two."

Mizzou is near the bottom of every Big 12 statistic except individual scoring, where Gardner leads the league with 20.2 points per game. Therefore, the Cats will pay special attention to the guard, Allen said. "We did a good job on him last time we played him," Allen said. "(Our goal) is not to really stop him, but contain him, so he doesn't shoot the ball as much."

Longer track awaits K-State athletes at upcoming ISU Classic

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a strong showing last weekend at the Sevinje Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., the K-State track team heads to Ames, Iowa, and Iowa State University for the ISU Classic.

"This meet is always interesting," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "The track is a little different than what we normally run on, and we expect to see some fast times turned in."

The track at the Lied Athletic Facility is larger than a normal indoor track at 300 meters instead of the normal 200 meters and is the largest indoor eight-lane track in the world. This means faster times for athletes running distances more than 200 meters since less time is spent turning, Rovelto said.

The team has been all about breaking records as of late, with senior Christian Smith setting a new NCAA and school record in the 1000-meter run with a time of 2:19.57, senior Breanna Eveland setting a new school record in the pole vault at 14 feet, 1.25 inches and Lisi Maurer breaking her own school record in the 60-meter hurdles with a time of 8.3 seconds. Smith was named the Big 12 Male Athlete of the Week for his run.

K-State's women appeared in the top 25 this week at the No. 21 spot after a brief dropout, according to www.trackwire.com. The Wildcat men dropped out after being ranked 24th last week. Both teams were ranked 20th before the season and were predicted to score 10 points each at the NCAA Indoor Championships.

Eveland, the first Wildcat female to ever pole vault above 14 feet, reset her own school record last weekend. The jump automatically qualifies her for the NCAA Indoor Championships and keeps her ranked number one on the Trackwire "Dandy Dozen." She is one of six Wildcats to earn the honor in the fourth Dozen of the season.

With a different kind of track and more competition to go up against, he expects a good showing this weekend, Rovelto said.

Cookie Season

Girl Scouts cookie sales bloom as spring months approach

By Brendan Praeger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An unexpected knock on the door usually means salespeople want to sell magazines to finance their spring break, but every January, an unexpected visitor might be selling something far more delicious than a subscription to Sports Illustrated.

At the beginning of every year, Girls Scouts begin their most profitable and popular fundraiser — Girl Scout Cookies.

"Cookie sales are the most important fundraiser for our organization," said Jennifer Rush, communications manager of Girl Scouts of Kaw Valley Council, which serves the 13 county area in Northeast Kansas that includes Riley County. "We sell nuts in the fall, but they are not nearly as popular."

Cookie sales begin in January, and the girls take orders until February. The cookies then are sold at local booths beginning Feb. 25. A list of locations will be posted at www.girlscouts.net.

After reimbursing the bakeries, the proceeds from the cookies go directly to the local Girl Scout council, Rush said.

"Fifty-three cents from every box sold actually goes to each individual troop," Rush said.

The Girl Scouts use their profits to train volunteer leaders, sponsor special events and maintain activity sets. Profits also are used to keep fees at a minimum and provide scholarships for members.

"No one who wants to be a Girl Scout is turned away for being unable to pay," Rush said.

According to www.girlscouts.org, the cookies have been part of American culture for more than 80 years. The first recorded sale of Girl Scout cookies was in 1917 in Muskogee, Okla., at a high school bake sale.

The national phenomenon began in 1922 following a sugar cookie recipe published in The American Girl magazine. A local director from that period described that seven dozen cookies could be made for about 30 cents, and they could be sold for as much as 25 cents per dozen, according to the Web site.

The cookies have been sold annually ever since, except for a brief period during WWII, when the girls sold calendars because of rationing.

According to the Web site, rather than baking the merchandise themselves, the Girl Scouts' cookies are now made by two licensed commercial bakeries — ABC Bakers and Little Brownie Bakers.

ABC Bakers provides cookies for troops in the Kaw Valley Council. A volunteer committee meets each year to decide which bakery will be used in the Kaw Valley Council area, Rush said. Taste and cost are part of the many criteria used to choose the right bakery.

Each baker is required to offer Thin Mints, Peanut Butter Sandwich and Shortbread cookies. They also can offer five additional flavors of their choice. The two other most popular cookies are Caramel de Lites and Peanut Butter Patties.

All five of the most popular cookies are among the top 15 bestselling cookies in the United States, and Thin Mints account for 24 percent of all Girl Scout cookie sales.

"Thin Mints are the best selling brand in America, even better than Oreos or Chips Ahoy," Rush said. "It's impressive when you consider that they're only sold for a short time each year."

The cookies also draw in a large crowd of loyal supporters each year.

"I love all the cookies, but thin mints are definitely the best," Alex Blecha, junior in park management and conservation, said. "It's a lot easier to justify buying cookies when it's going towards a good cause."

Reel thrills: "Firewall" warns viewers of tech dangers

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Harrison Ford's latest film, "Firewall," is an action-packed thriller based firmly in the harrowing realities of modern technology.

Ford plays Jack Stanfield, a bank executive and the creator of a powerful anti-theft computer system that protects banks from internet hackers.

His life is turned upside-down when a ruthless criminal takes his family hostage and demands that Stanfield override his own system to steal millions of dollars — implicating himself in the process. In a desperate race against time, Stanfield must find a way to outsmart a criminal who knows every detail of his identity and save his wife and children, whose lives hang in the balance.

To prepare for his role, Ford said he met with a number of banking professionals and software designers to get a better understanding of the way they live their lives.

"In every case where I'm playing a character who has an occupation that I'm unfamiliar with, I want to acquire the details of exactly how they do their job, and what it is they literally do when they go to work," Ford said.

While many movie plots border on the impossible, Ford's co-star Paul Bettany said "Firewall" resonates with audiences because its theme of identity theft is a real concern in modern society.

"We are asking people to believe this could happen to you," Bettany said. "That's the conceit of how this sort of thriller works. Your family life could be turned upside-down. How safe is your identity?"

Bettany, who plays the film's ruthless thief, Bill Cox, said he wanted to avoid portraying his character as the villainous caricature that many other films employ.

"I think that even if an audience doesn't understand why it's investing less in the characters, it's always because their belief in the situation has been undermined," he said. "I want to give people a good ride in the movie. I try to produce a villain grounded in some version of reality."

Ford said he was drawn to the film by its strong script and the opportunity to play a different type of character from his past films. Referred to as an action hero by many movie critics, the actor said this classification was a terrible mistake.

"I'm not an action hero," Ford said. "I've never actually done action films. I think of films like 'Lethal Weapon' as action films. I've never actually done one like that."

Ford said many fans' and critics' perception of him as a person and as an actor might be influenced by his body of work, and the type of characters he portrays onscreen.

"It may well be that people

are relating more to what they take to be my persona, but my persona is a dramatic construction of its own," he said. "Perception is in the eye of the beholder, and people perceive me in a way that is not an exact match for who I am."

Bettany said he thought very little about choosing films to establish himself as a certain type of actor.

"I don't have any sort of grand scheme, and I never think about how it looks as a body of work afterwards," he said. "My only plan is the same one I've had since I started, which was to do as many different types of things as I can with as many different types of people."

"Firewall" opens in theaters nationwide today.

iPods skins get personal

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students have an opportunity to get a new skin for their iPod, laptop or cell phone.

The skin is a removable vinyl cover for many accessories that individuals might want to personalize.

Lindsey Groepper, media relations director for Blast Media, said the skins are a great way to show school spirit.

"It looks awesome," she said. "There are greek designs and school designs that are officially licensed that can really personalize someone's device."

She said it won't leave any residue and won't fade or peel. The vinyl is not permanent and is designed to last for years. She said each design is cut individually and can't be mass produced.

"This is high quality," she said. "You won't be taking off the faceplate and can't ruin the device."

The smaller covers for mp3 players, cell phones and PDAs are $12.95 and the larger ones for lap tops are $24.95, which includes shipping. The cover then will be shipped to the person who ordered it within 10 days.

"This is really cool and we just want people to know that this is out there," she said.

Tom Stemple, co-founder of Skint Incorporated, the company that supplies the skins, said the concept originated by starting with wallpapers and screensavers.

"We just thought that people were able to personalize the inside, they ought to be able to personalize the outside," he said.

He said there is a pattern in the adhesive that allows the air bubbles to be pushed out so that the skin will lay flat on the device.

The company, under the name cellfan.com, will be changed to Skint in a few months. The skins can be ordered from the www.cellfan.com site and there are a variety of categories to choose from. Categories include but are not limited to collegiate, sports, art, military and comics.

Stemple said since the start of the company in November 2004 business has been strong.

"The business has exceeded three times what we expected," he said. "We will still be gearing many of the skins toward schools because the demographics are good."

He said the school skins are doing well because they allow a student to personalize something with their school spirit.

"We will continue to stay really focused at the collegiate level," he said. "It takes a lot of time just to stay on top of it. There may be as many as 500 new phones this year, and we want to give students what they want."

Manhattan Town Center offers personal shoppers for V-Day

Holiday event geared toward students

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Valentine's Day is Tuesday, meaning that those with a special someone have only four days left to buy presents.

From 6 to 9 p.m. tonight, Manhattan Town Center, Third Street and Poyntz Avenue, is having a Valentine 911 to offer help for those who are having trouble finding Valentine's Day presents.

"Basically ... we're going to have personal shoppers that will be available in Center Court by the fountain," said Sara Van Allen, marketing manager for Manhattan Town Center. "They can help anyone — guys, girls — find that perfect gift for Valentine's Day."

The personal shoppers will be Manhattan Town Center employees as well as apparel, marketing and design majors, Van Allen said. Shoppers do not have to pre-register in order to secure time with a personal shopper, she added.

"They (personal shoppers) will just be hanging out, waiting to help someone, so people can just come on down," she said.

Van Allen said Power Hits KJCK-FM 97.5 will be doing a live remote from Center Court from 6 to 8 p.m.

There will be giveaways of gift certificates from Whiskey Creek Steakhouse, Chili's Grill & Bar and Kay Jewelers, along with other items. She said she hopes this will help appeal to K-State students.

"We're doing a live remote with Power Hits, so that's the demographic we hope it appeals to," she said. "Plus, a lot of college students are at the early stages of dating, so they might need help finding a gift that they feel is good, and also appropriate."

Brad Tutak, junior in pre-professional business administration, said having personal shoppers available is a good idea.

"I think people would take advantage of help, if it's there," Tutak said. "Some guys might be a little embarrassed to ask someone to shop for them, but if they really need help, I think they'd ask."

Liz Nelson, sophomore in family studies and human services, said the personal shoppers will appeal mostly to younger consumers.

"By the time you're older, you've been together long enough that you know the other person's tastes," she said.

However, Van Allen said couples at any stage in a relationship could benefit from the event.

"Even married couples who have been married for awhile could really benefit from this, you know, if they want to get something really different for their spouse this Valentine's Day," she said.

Whether this is one's first Valentine's Day with someone, or your sixth, Van Allen said taking advantage of Valentine 911 could be a great option.

"A little outside help never hurt," she said.

Library houses K-State history

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There's always a new old thing in University Archives.

University Archivist Tony Crawford had a small metal statue of a K-State football player Thursday he said he'd acquired recently.

The player is rushing the ball with one arm straight out and his head facing down. The name S. A. McCullum is etched into the base, along with the date, 9-31.

University Archives shares space in Hale Library's Special Collections with the Rare Books department on the fifth floor, and takes up the entire top level of the library's stacks.

Crawford has worked to preserve K-State history since he came to K-State in 1983. The archives accepts donations of old materials for preservation and continually looks for things to add to the collection.

He said the university is required to keep some records by law, but there are many things it keeps because it might come in handy later.

For instance, K-State has gone back into its archives to find records to help with legal cases, he said.

Pictures from the archives were used for an article in the Nov. 30 issue of the New York Times on Clementine Paddleford, a culinary journalist who graduated from Kansas State Agricultural College in 1921.

Crawford said University Archives has one of the best collection of books on cooking in the nation.

The department uses several means of recording history as it happens, as well as reclaiming it. Its employees keep watch over many publications for stories involving the university and catalogue them.

They often must take measures to preserve the materials, especially newspaper articles, which are printed on paper that is very acidic and will erode over time. Often, the articles are photocopied to better paper.

Clementine Paddleford graduated from Kansas State Agricultural College in 1921. She wrote a column on food from 1940 to 1967 for This Week, a magazine inserted in the Sunday editions of newspapers nationwide.

Acid in paper makes it turn yellow and brittle over time.

University Archives also maintains folders on subjects for which researchers are likely to need information.

There is a large series of folders on the Landon Lectures, one for every speaker. The folder for President George W. Bush's lecture last month includes clippings of comments on the speech printed in the Collegian's Campus Forum.

The environment also is important inside the archives. The lights are covered with special filters to remove paper-damaging ultraviolet rays, and Crawford said the temperature is controlled to be around 68 degrees with 45 to 50 percent relative humidity.

A hygrometer in the stacks read 68.6 degrees with 57 percent humidity. Crawford said he was not worried by the reading, saying consistency in environment is more important than just having it in a certain range.

There are several students employed by the department who work each day to catalogue new additions and assist with research.

"The work is really interesting, the collections, the books and things we're surrounded by," Casey Thilges, senior in psychology, said.

Pat Patton, research specialist with the department, spends much of her time helping visiting researchers with their projects.

Patton showed one book she'd helped create. "The Wicked Game" by Howard Soules, is about modern golf and includes information about Tiger Woods.

Woods's father, Earl, grew up in Manhattan in a house that still stands at 1015 Yuma St., she said.

University Archives keeps the most important materials, in Hale Library and stores the rest at the K-State Foundation.

Researchers are required to leave identification with the desk and wait in the reading room while employees bring them materials related to the subjects they requested.

The reading room has countless pieces of history on display. One case contains several images and depictions of K-State's many mascots.

One the lesser-known ones on display is Boscoe, the black labrador retriever of unknown origin that was the football and baseball teams' mascot from 1906 to 1909.

Patton said Boscoe would travel with the baseball team and appear at games wearing a purple cape with the letters "KSAC" on the sides. She said a University of Kansas fraternity stole the cape and it had to be replaced.

Original Dixie Chicks member to give concert

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Robin Macy, a founding member of the Dixie Chicks, will perform 8 p.m. Saturday at the Manhattan Arts Center.

Macy will perform as part of the BirdHouse Acoustic Music Series. Her band consists of K-State alumnus Kenny White on guitars and mandolin, Darren Wilcox on bass and Rick Martinez on percussion.

David Kamerer, BirdHouse founder, said he invited Macy to come to Manhattan.

Kamerer said that at the time Macy was with the Dixie Chicks, they were a regional band in Texas with an independent label. They went more commercial country, and Macy wanted to stay true to the roots with bluegrass and Western swing.

"She's a great singer with a beautiful soul," he said. "It's going to be a really fun evening."

This is Macy's third time performing in Manhattan. She has sold out the Manhattan Arts Center twice before with her previous band Big Twang. She also performed for the department of horticulture in the fall.

"There's so much energy and hope in a college town," Macy said. "Because I have a connection with K-State horticulture and former students of mine, it's fun to see familiar faces in the crowd."

In addition to being a musician, Macy also teaches high school math at the Wichita Collegiate School.

"I've been blessed that I have this career teaching teenagers," Macy said. "I do this a lot less than I used to, so when I do, it feels really special."

Macy said she has been rebuilding and caring for the Bartlett Arboretum that was started in 1910 in Belle Plaine, Kan. Macy said it is similar to a tree museum with enormous old trees and flower gardens, and it is the only mature arboretum between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains.

"I've been writing a lot of songs," Macy said. "The originals that we'll be doing are songs I've written lately. The music's become a voice for the passion I have for the outdoors and, in particular, for the Bartlett Arboretum."

The BirdHouse Acoustic Music Series was started 11 years ago and provides a concert once a month throughout the school year.

"The Manhattan Arts Center has an intimate setting and great sound," Kamerer said. "It's the ideal concert environment. Every seat is a good seat, and you get to meet the artist afterwards."

Amerie Schneider, senior in anthropology, said she thinks the concert will prove successful.

"I really enjoy the Dixie Chicks, and I enjoy all types of different music," Schneider said. "I'm excited because it's something new and different to do on a Saturday night instead of the same old bars or parties."

Kamerer said the community is lucky to have Macy.

"She's played on major stages, and now she's going to play just for us," Kamerer said. "She's got a great personality. Her music is real, open and life-affirming. It'll be a fun night."

Professor to appear on PBS

By Ben Spicer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fred Brock, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, will appear in the eighth episode of the PBS series, "Boomers: Redefining Life After Fifty."

The episode, entitled "Fiscal Fitness" will air at 4:30 p.m. Saturday, February 25 on Topeka's KTWU, channel 11.

Brock, who has worked as an editor and reporter for The Wall Street Journal, The Houston Chronicle, The Louisville Courier-Journal, and has written two books in recent years, both on financial planning and investment. He said it was his background in the subject which landed him a role in the program.

"76 million baby boomers, a huge chunk of the population, is about to retire," Brock said, "many of which are not prepared to do so."

The PBS episode is one of 13 targeted towards the baby boomer generation as the show offers advice on such topics as retirement, relationships and financial planning.

Brock, who holds the R. M. Seaton Professional Journalism Chair and is a former New York Times business editor and columnist, said baby boomers were great spenders but not great savers.

"People will downsize and sell their houses while moving to cheaper places of the country to live," he said. "They will leave the big cities and move on to college-sized towns for a less pressured life."

Many K-State students will be shown as well in the feature, as Brock will be shown telling a class of his students about the impact of the baby boomers leaving the job market.

"With the loss of so much of the labor force, it will create a labor shortage enabling the next generations of workers like generation X to have choices in the job market," he said.

Brock also said future generations should begin to focus on their financial planning now.

"One of the big problems we have is that they often do not teach financial planning in high school," he said. "It would benefit those in high school or college even to see how financial planning effects them."

Angela Powers, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications said having professor Brock teaching at K-State gives students a role model and someone to emulate in the field.

"His expertise in business journalism offers special knowledge to students because of his background," she said. "The students get to know him unlike a guest speaker over a much longer period of time."

Powers said Brock brings a level of professionalism to his work while bringing the "big apple to the little apple." She also said she was pleased for him that he has been so successful.

Business couldn't explain it, but the connection was there. The Collegian's strong advertising arms created a sensation Business had not felt in years. Business knew advertising would increase sales and general awareness among college students and the K-State faculty. Business could see this was beginning of a beautiful relationship.

Committee works to improve nutrition in schools

Group emphasizes education, activity among schoolchildren

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With childhood obesity levels on the rise, public education is taking new measures to ensure student nutrition.

"Two thousand hours are spent by children in school each year, so schools play a critical role in the foods children eat everyday," said Dianna Schalles, registered dietitian and health educator at Lafene Health Center. "Obviously a cooperative effort is needed between parents, schools, coaches — we all need to take an equal responsibility in being good role models."

The Child Nutrition and WIC Reauthorization Act of 2004 made several changes to child nutrition programs. This legislation requires schools to have new wellness policy guidelines established by June 30.

The United States Department of Agriculture, through which this legislation was passed, also requires all school districts in the nation to have an established wellness committee. These committees are responsible for developing wellness policy guidelines that are suitable for each district.

The Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Wellness Committee consists of 24 teachers, students, community members, parents and administrators, and has been working to develop these guidelines since the legislation passed in 2004.

The committee is divided into three separate branches, and each branch is establishing criteria in one specific area. The three areas are nutrition, nutrition education and physical activity. The committee has been meeting about once a month, and will meet again on Feb. 16.

"The regulation came down from the USDA without really a lot of direction," Donna Keyser, food service director for USD 383, said. "So we're working with those guidelines and tweaking them for our own district."

Model policies and guidelines have been established by the Kansas State Department of Education, and these guidelines have been useful in the planning process, Keyser said. The guidelines are based on three achievement levels — basic, advanced and exemplary.

However, USD 383 recognized this problem and was taking steps to better nutrition for its students before the wellness committee was established. Another school health program was established in the district's middle schools three years ago.

"Manhattan had no problem being at the basic level — we were already there," Keyser said. "Now we're trying to move into a more advanced level."

David Dziewaltowski, distinguished professor with K-State's Community Health Institute, researches the prevention of obesity in children and in schools.

"The hypothesis is that if you provide children with healthier options in school, they'll be more likely to eat healthier," Dziewaltowski, who is also a member of the USD 383 wellness committee, said.

The percent of children who are substantially overweight has tripled from 1970 to 2002. Both as a parent and a professional, Dziewaltowski said he is concerned about mixed messages that sometimes appear in school settings.

"The environment we live in today promotes bad choices," Dziewaltowski said. "The questions that come up now are, 'should fast food companies be able to market to kids and parents? Is that a good thing, given that marketing clearly has an impact on the eating behaviors of children?'"

One concern is that non-nutritious food items appear in many outlets throughout the school environment. For example, it is not uncommon for schools to have soft drinks in vending machines or for fast food restaurants to sponsor fundraisers or other events, he said.

Another concern is the fact that less nutritious foods are sometimes sold by the students themselves to raise money for various organizations, as school funding has been tight.

"I realize schools are short on funding and that's something that sells," Shalles said. "It will be well thought-out and hopefully open doors to seek out new avenues for funding."

In addition to obesity, Shalles, who is a member of the wellness committee, worries about the increase of other eating disorders as well.

"Things like food given as a reward is one of my biggest concerns," she said. "I see so many people who have problems and turn to food for comfort because they've been brought up to expect food as a reward."

A lot of common ground exists between the two main types of weight maintenance issues — obesity and starvation. Both disorders originate with disordered eating habits and students being raised with nutrition misconceptions, she said.

"Kids aren't mature enough to see the balance, so they take these messages to the extreme," Shalles said.

Panda Express to begin offering sushi soon

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Union Governing Board met Thursday afternoon with Adam Settler, general manager of Panda Express, who presented the plan for the restaurant's expansion to offer sushi.

"There's nothing Japanese-oriented around here, and it's been successful at other universities," Settler said. "I think it'll go over really well."

Settler said the sushi will cost between $4 and $7. He hopes to start in less than a month.

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said Starbucks visited the Union Feb. 1 to look at the Union Station.

"We're also looking at the library and have sent them blueprints of Union Station," Connaughton said.

Connaughton said there will be another Scholarship Day for high school seniors from 8 a.m. to 2 p.m. today. At the end of the day, scholarship winners will be announced.

"It's a nice recognition for the parents and recipients of the scholarships," Connaughton said.

There will be an opening gala from 6 to 7:30 tonight before the Vagina Monologues performance at 8 p.m. Proceeds go to the Ali Kemp Foundation.

"Tickets will be $15 per person and $20 for a couple," Nicole Boan, UPC president, said. "Hors d'oeuvres and wine will be served at the gala and Ali Kemp's father also will speak."

Boan also announced more plans for the 50th anniversary of the Union. The UPC is requesting The Benders for the Tuesday Night Buzz on March 7. Taco Bell will be selling 50 cent tacos in the Union on March 8.

Another topic discussed was that a proposal has been submitted to the bond department for $1 million for a new sprinkler system in the Union.

"It's called an automated sprinkler system," Connaughton said. "The fire marshal said some inventory items need to be protected."

Landmark National Bank going through expansion

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In less than five years, Patrick Alexander has seen the organization he manages grow by 400 percent.

As president and chief executive officer of Landmark National Bank, Alexander has overseen the acquisition of three other institutions and watched as the bank's assets have grown from $150 million in 2001 to nearly $600 million today.

"We're doing very well," said Alexander, who has been with Landmark National since 1990. "I think it's imperative that we continue to grow, whether it be internally or through acquisitions, because you've got to continue to grow your asset base to spread those costs and grow your earnings stream."

Landmark National, headquartered in Manhattan at 800 Poyntz Ave., continued its growth into 2006 when it acquired FirstBank effective Jan. 1.

Because of Landmark National's merger with FirstBank, Landmark's headquarters will move about one block east of its present location to 701 Poyntz Ave. on Feb. 21. The current Landmark National location will close Feb. 18 to accommodate the move.

That gain, coupled with acquisitions of Landmark Federal Savings Bank in October 2003 when Landmark National was known as Security National Bank, and First Kansas Financial in April 2004, increased Landmark National's total locations across Kansas to its present-day total of 20 banks and 24 ATMs.

But the process hasn't been entirely smooth.

Alexander said the task of making two companies work as one cooperative unit is not always easy to do, especially when the growth is so rapid.

"You've got to be able to assimilate that growth and be able to mold it all into one operation," Alexander said. "That takes some resources and some expertise, and over the years, as we've grown and made acquisitions, we've gotten better and better at doing it. It's not as much of a burden as it used to be, but still, it's quite an undertaking to take two organizations and mold them into one."

Larry Heyka, Manhattan market president for Landmark National and former president and CEO of FirstBank, said banks attempt to gain more assets like any other business, in the interest of increasing profits and driving down costs to make the company more efficient, with an attention to keeping customers happy.

"Growth — the right kind of growth — is positive for any business," Heyka said. "It's about efficiencies and the people involved in the banking locations. If you can be more efficient, you can provide better interest rates, more services, pay higher costs on your deposits and those kinds of things."

Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said Manhattan's growing economy fosters business growth and expansion.

"The economy in Manhattan and Riley County is expanding, and the statistics out there show that," Butler said. "To help with all the housing and building expansion, you do need the financing mechanisms that banks and financial institutions offer area businesses and individuals."

"We've seen a rapid expansion of the total dollar deposits over the last five years according to the FDIC, which indicates there is a growing and strong economy here in Manhattan and Riley County."

After experiencing unprecedented growth in the last five years, Alexander said Landmark National's organization wants to continue its recent growth, should the situation be right.

"So far, we've concentrated all of our growth efforts in the state," he said. "Certainly, we wouldn't be adverse to looking at something outside the state if the right opportunity came up."

"We're excited about what's ahead, especially given some of the economic growth that we're seeing in the region with the expanding economy due to the Fort Riley expansion."

Landmark National bank, headquartered in Manhattan at 800 Poyntz Ave., will move to 701 Poyntz Ave. on Feb. 21 because of its merger with FirstBank.

Children's play based on 'Stuart Little' to show this weekend at McCain Auditorium

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Actors and child-size puppets will bring to life "The Big Adventures of Stuart Little" Saturday afternoon at McCain Auditorium.

The play by Richmond, Va.-based Theatre IV is based on E.B. White's book, "Stuart Little." It tells the story of a noble mouse born to the Little family and his adventures with his human brother and his friend Margalo, according to a press release.

"It's bringing to life a book they read in school," said Eric Williams, director of tour operations for Theatre IV.

The story is set in New York

City in the 1930s or 1940s, Williams said. The puppets are manipulated by actors dressed in clothing of that time period.

"You'll find yourself watching both the actor and the mouse," Williams said.

The cat, Snowball, is a puppet worn like a shawl around an actor's shoulders, Williams said. The bird, Margalo, is a rod puppet, and the dogs and other cats are 3-4 feet tall foam cut-outs.

"We chose it because of it being a good show by a reputable company," said Thomas Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain.

Before the performance, there will be an Arts Playground for children ages 2 to 15 at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, said Kathrine Schlageck, education and public services supervisor for the museum.

"We have a very active early childhood program here at the Beach (museum) so what we'll see is this happening more and more often," she said.

The Arts Playground will feature arts and crafts, creative drama activities and a storyteller, Llewellyn Crain, Friends of McCain volunteer, said.

"I just think it really enhances the theater-going experience," Crain said. "It makes a very complete experience, and it allows them to express themselves."

"The Big Adventures of Stuart Little"

When: 3 p.m. Saturday

Where: McCain Auditorium

How much: $5.50-$7.50 for K-State students; $9-$13 for K-State faculty. Tickets can be purchased by calling (785) 532-6428 or at www.k-state.edu/mccain.

All touring Theatre IV productions are educationally based, Williams said, on literature, holidays or historical figures, among other categories.

"(Attending a production) teaches them about theaters and being an audience member," Williams said.

Students look to buy books later in the semester

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most K-State students agree that textbooks are expensive; but not many try to complete an entire course without them, despite indications of a national trend, documented in the Washington Post, toward passing on textbooks.

"Students have always done that (tried to do without books)," Steve Levin, Varney's Book Store manager, said.

"Students have always

"I don't use course packs to save my students money. It's just more congenial for the courses I teach."

David Smit

thought textbooks cost too much."

Levin said students try to take classes without using the textbooks, borrow books from Hale Library, purchase books online or share with other students to lower the costs.

Sales at Varney's and the K-State Student Union Bookstore, however, have been relatively constant over the past several semesters, Levin said.

He said, though, he has not-ticed a trend toward students purchasing textbooks later in the semester.

Levin said there is a spike in sales before each semester's first round of open-book tests, when students decide it is inconvenient to share a textbook.

Melissa Martin, junior in communication sciences and disorders, encountered that inconvenience after trying to share a speech pathology textbook with two other students.

"It got too confusing working out our schedules and study times," she said. "There was too much reading to get done, and some of the tests are open-book, so I needed my own for those. I also like to highlight in my books, and I didn't feel like I could do that if the book wasn't just mine."

Martin said she decided the textbook was worth its cost because she will keep it to use as a reference when she begins her career.

David Smit, professor of English, uses course packets instead of textbooks for some of his classes.

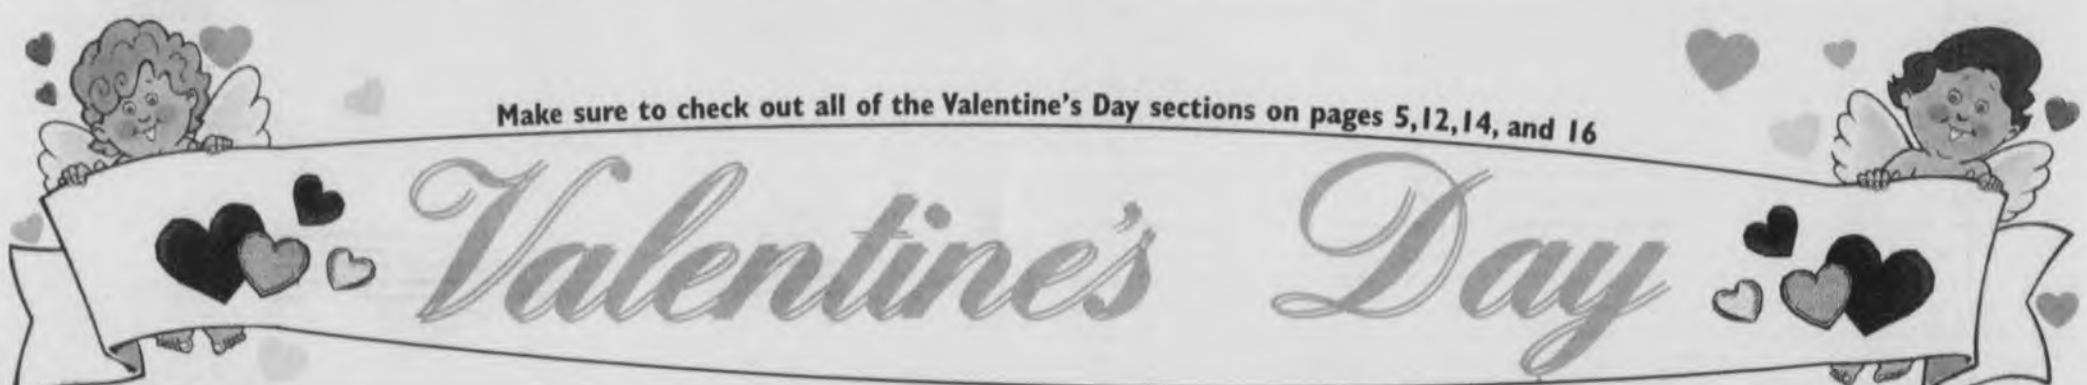

"I teach fairly specialized courses," he said. "Textbooks are written for fairly generic courses."

"I don't use course packs to save my students money. It's just more congenial for the courses I teach."

However, for his literature courses, Smit said he requires a packet and two books, and most students usually have the books, whether owned, borrowed or shared.

"They have to do the reading, whether they buy the book or not," he said.

Kansas Senate passes concealed gun bill 29-11

By Carl Manning
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Law-abiding Kansans could carry concealed guns under a bill that passed the Senate by enough votes Thursday to override a veto by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, who spiked a similar measure two years ago.

The 29-11 vote - two more than needed to override the Democratic governor - includes six senators from her party. The question is how many will go against her should she veto the measure.

The bill now goes to the House, where Speaker Doug Mays predicted passage. He said overriding a veto is "always difficult" because "the votes tend to evaporate."

Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt, R-Independence, said, "If there is a veto, they will be under tremendous pressure to support the governor. I would be surprised if anybody who voted no on the bill will vote to override."

But sponsoring Sen. Phil Journey sees it differently.

"It's either go against the governor or go against their district," said Journey, R-Haysville.

One Democrat, Sen. Jim Barone of Frontenac, said he would go against the governor.

"I have on this issue before and I will again," he said.

Sebelius rejected a nearly identical bill in 2004, saying she didn't believe the measure would make residents safer. Spokeswoman Nicole Corcoran said the governor wants to see the bill before deciding, but noted vetoed bills returning in much the same form can expect the same fate.

"Are we going through an exercise in futility? The real question is whether there are 27 and 84 votes to override a veto because that's a certainty," he said, referring to the two-thirds majority needed by both chambers to void a veto.

Journey said that by joining 46 other states that allow concealed guns, Kansans will be safer. He said more than 2 million Americans have concealed-gun permits and predicted about 48,000 permits would be issued in Kansas in the first four years.

"The reality is this isn't a vote about the governor or the elections. It's a vote about freedom," Journey said. "It's about the freedom of Kansans to protect themselves and their families."

Not everyone agreed.

Sen. Roger Reitz, R-Manhattan, said the bill would result in accidental injuries and deaths.

"I reject his arguments out of hand," Reitz said. "Handguns are for killing people."

The bill lists 17 areas where a concealed gun can't be carried, including law enforcement offices, courthouses, state or local government buildings and schools. Efforts to add churches, veterans hospitals and libraries to that list failed.

Journey said the bill allows such places to post a sign banning firearms from their premises. Violators would face a maximum penalty of six months in jail and a $1,000 fine.

"Who are we to tell churches what they can or can't do?" Barone said. "It would take away the right of a church's self-determination on this issue."

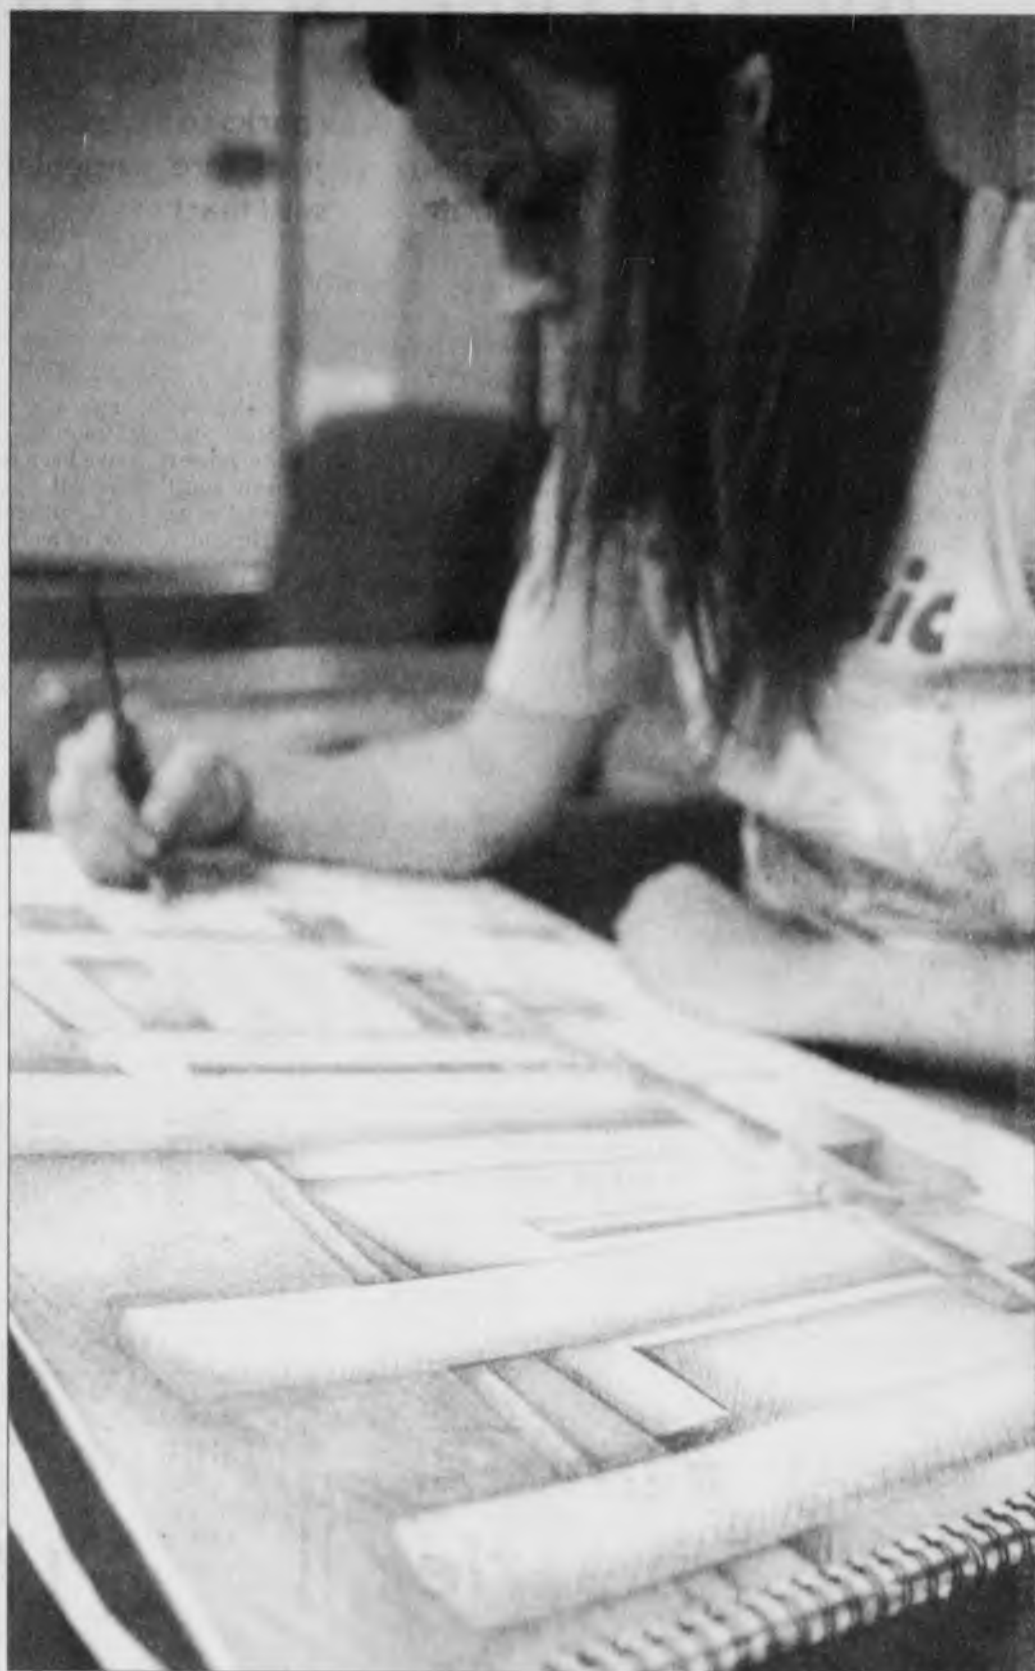

Under the proposal, Kansans who are 21 or older and U.S. citizens could obtain a four-year permit by filling out an application with the local sheriff and paying a fee of up to $150.

The attorney general's office would issue the permits after conducting background checks to eliminate those with a felony record, a history of mental illness, drug or alcohol addiction, or a physical infirmity that would prevent the safe handling of a weapon.

Once past that hurdle, the person would be required to complete an eight-hour safety and training course by a firearms instructor certified by the attorney general or the National Rifle Association.

The bill would make Kansans among the 36 "shall issue" states, meaning if a person clears the hurdles, the state must issue the permit. Eight other states have "may issue" laws, giving officials latitude. Two states - Alaska and Vermont - have no prohibitions for carrying a concealed weapon.

Man convicted for kidnapping kids, refusing to give location

By Matt Sedensky
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — Tina Porter won. But she was not celebrating.

The mother whose children went missing after a weekend visit with their father nearly two years ago cried as the judge announced her ex-husband, Daniel Porter, was found guilty Thursday of four kidnapping charges.

"What happened here today doesn't really change anything," Tina Porter said. "Because Sam and Lindsey are still gone."

And there is no sign any change is in store.

Since the children's disappearance, Daniel Porter has terrorized his ex-wife and taunted authorities with varying stories of their fate. His public defender said 42-year-old Porter only sought to protect his children from an abusive childhood like his own, but jurors didn't buy it.

He faces up to 38 years in prison for his convictions.

The verdict came after about four hours of deliberations. In two days of testimony, the jury heard 90 minutes of questioning of the defendant's ex-wife, saw a videotape of the couple's conversation at a police station after the defendant's arrest and watched just one witness take the stand for the defense.

The videotape and prosecution witnesses combined to depict a rambling Daniel Porter who gave numerous accounts of the fates of Sam and Lindsey — that they were sold for $6,001, that they were strangled and thrown in a river, even that they had become part of a pornography ring.

"I killed them," he told his ex-wife in their videotaped exchange. "Tell the judge I killed them."

Authorities — and the children's mother — have doubted the veracity of that statement. But they aren't sure what to believe.

The children have been missing since June 2004, when Daniel Porter picked them up from his ex-wife for a weekend visit. Since then, investigators have scoured the Kansas City suburbs of Independence and Sugar Creek and searched the area around Daniel Porter's hometown of Trenton in northern Missouri, but have come up with nothing.

Defense attorney Tim Burdick suggested his client feared that men Tina Porter was involved with might treat the children as Daniel Porter's stepfather allegedly treated him.

"I'm not saying what we're looking at is rational. I'm not saying what we're looking at is reasonable. I'm not saying what we're looking at is good cause," Burdick said in his closing statement. "The question is, what was his purpose?"

That, prosecutors said, was clear, and mandated Porter be found guilty not of just two counts of parental kidnapping, as Burdick said the jury should, but also of two counts of the more serious kidnapping charge.

"The defendant used his children as objects to terrorize Tina Porter," said Bronwyn Werner, an assistant Jackson County prosecutor. "He chose the most ghastly means with which to get back at her."

Tina Porter sat pensive in the courtroom's front row during closing arguments Thursday. Porter received a 10-year prison sentence last May on an unrelated gun charge, a stiff sentence prosecutors had hoped would persuade the defendant to reveal his children's whereabouts. It didn't, but Jackson County Prosecutor Mike Sanders said — as he has throughout the case — that Daniel Porter holds the keys to his own jail cell and that he may be willing to negotiate a lesser sentence.

Sgt. Dennis Green, a detective with the Independence Police Department, said authorities continue to work leads in the case. He said the conviction Thursday was bittersweet because the children, ages 7 and 8 at the time of their disappearance, are still missing.

Rick Bailey, a 58-year-old Joplin man who was the jury foreman, said some jurors stumbled over the prosecution's claim that Daniel Porter kidnapped his children in an effort to terrorize his ex-wife, but after getting clarifications to questions, they all agreed.

Scientists use Darwin's birthday to get support for evolution theory

By Kathy Matheson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHILADELPHIA — Thanks to the "intelligent design" movement, Charles Darwin's birthday is evolving into everything from a badminton party to church sermons.

Defenders of Darwin's theory of natural selection are planning hundreds of events around the world Sunday, the 197th anniversary of his birth, saying recent challenges to the teaching of evolution have re-emphasized the need to promote his work.

"The people who believe in evolution ... really just sort of need to stand up and be counted," said Richard Leventhal, director of the University of Pennsylvania's Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology. "Evolution is the model that drives science. It's time to recognize that."

The museum's celebration will include birthday cake, a little badminton (reportedly a favorite game of Darwin's) and a reading of his "The Origin of Species" by Penn junior Bill Wames, who planned to dress as the 19th-century naturalist.

At the University of Victoria in British Columbia, Canada, philosophy students will get a jump-start on Darwin Day on campus Friday by singing Darwin carols they composed.

Darwin, who was born in England on Feb. 12, 1809, and died in 1882, was 50 when he published "The Origin of Species." His conclusion that species evolve over time was based in part on zoological and geological discoveries made during a five-year voyage around the world on the HMS Beagle.

The intelligent design movement challenges Darwin's theory, contending that organisms are so complex that they must have been created by some kind of higher being. Critics of intelligent design say it is creationism camouflaged in scientific language.

Intelligent design proponents suffered legal setbacks last year in Pennsylvania and Georgia, but Kansas education officials have approved science standards that treat evolution as a flawed theory.

Polls have shown many Americans don't accept evolution. A Gallup poll in 2004 found that about 35 percent of Americans believe Darwin's theory is well supported by evidence, another 35 percent thought it was not well-supported and 29 percent said they didn't know enough about it.

To show religion and science are not at odds, more than 400 churches of many denominations, most of them in the United States, have agreed to participate in "Evolution Sunday" by giving a sermon, holding classes or sponsoring discussions.

Organizer Michael Zimmerman, a biology professor and dean at the University of Wisconsin at Oshkosh, said there is "no reason that people have to choose between religion and science."

MISSOURI | Allen sees playing time increase

Allen — one of Gardner's defenders in the previous matchup — played some big minutes off the bench and was 2-of-6 from the field and 3-of-4 from the free-throw line against Iowa State.

His playing time was unexpected, but if he maintains his energetic role off the bench, he might play even more against the Tigers, he said.

"I was surprised to come off the bench," Allen said. "But if I do my job and do it well, you'll probably see me out there (against Missouri) a lot. I defend, score, hit the open shot — I think I do that all very well."

Coach Jim Wooldridge watched the Iowa State game from the hospital after undergoing surgery Wednesday morning to remove a bulging disk in his neck. The surgery went smoothly and he is now resting at home, according to a release.

Assistant coach Jimmy Elgas filled in for Wooldridge as interim coach on Wednesday — his first head-coaching opportunity in his six years at K-State.

He is 1-0 as head coach, and as far as Diarra is concerned, he did a heck of a job.

"I think he did an amazing job of coaching us. I was very satisfied by his performance as a first time coach," Diarra said.

Despite Mizzou's recent drought and the question mark on Coach Quinn Snyder's job, Elgas said he knows his players need to be ready and willing to do whatever it takes to win.

"You have to be prepared. You have to be willing to go in there and play hard and compete and fight," Elgas said. They (Missouri's coaches) are going to get those kids to play hard."

More importantly, because there is only a month of league play left, each contest carries the same magnitude, Elgas said.

"This is the second half of league play. We've got one down and seven to go, and I really believe every game is big from here on out," Elgas said.

"Every practice is big. Every opportunity that you get with these kids is big. And that is our approach."

GARDNER | Missouri team has nothing to lose; Wildcats own 1-5 record away from home this season

Coach Quinn Snyder's players hoist up careless shots, complain to the refs and take no responsibility for their poor play.

This is nothing new for Missouri, which ranks near the bottom of the Big 12 in three-point percentage and overall field-goal percentage.

The last two years, however, Snyder's squads haven't had enough talent to beat teams entirely on skill.

Snyder will be fired. It is all a matter of timing. I don't know one Missouri fan who likes the guy.

If I were Missouri's athletic director, I would fire Snyder as soon as possible and look into hiring former Utah coach Rick Majerus.

If Missouri is really in such bad shape, why am I worried about K-State's chances of winning?

Simple. Missouri has nothing left to lose.

Snyder is no longer in a fight for his job — he's practically lost it.

Tiger fans? They have all but given up. The Tigers will play hard, if only to prove they are not as bad as we think. And you can be sure Gardner will do everything he can to fulfill his promise.

In addition, the Wildcats have trouble winning on the road. They are just 1-5 away from Bramlage.

K-State has lost to Baylor and Oklahoma State when they were arguably the two worst teams in the Big 12.

If K-State loses to Missouri — undeniably the conference's current cellar dweller — what message does that send to other teams in the conference?

Hopefully, we won't have to find out.

FUND | New Nissan Frontier truck awaits top volunteer

Kim O'Connor, senior in nutrition sciences, was the Foundation's Telefund prize clerk and said she spent last semester gathering the prizes.

"I went to different businesses asking if they'd like to donate," she said. "I got a lot of gift certificates and T-shirts."

O'Connor said locally owned businesses, especially those in Aggieville, were generous.

"The fact that KSU is such a big part of Manhattan makes many businesses feel like giving back to the students and helping them out," she said.

The grand prize once again this year is the Teletruck, which is a new Nissan Frontier. A truck is donated annually by Wichita Area Big Wheels.

Leon W. "Red" Skelton and his wife, M. Elaine, are chairpersons for the group. Skelton said the Wichita Area Big Wheels club members donate $250 or $500 toward the Teletruck, and with the help of Davis-Moore Auto Group, the grand prize is purchased.

"My wife and I started this group about 10 years ago," he said. "Gordon (Dowell) asked about donating prizes for Telefund, and the club donated two nice bicycles."

Skelton said he supports Telefund because of what it benefits.

"Telefund raises $1.3 to $1.4 million for scholarships every year," he said. "That is important, and that is one reason I support it."

Dowell said one of the great things about Telefund is what students learn from it.

"We help 1,600 students each year to understand what it means to serve their alma mater because they serve as the conduit between alumni and college departmental scholarship funds," he said.

To see live coverage of Telefund activities, access the Web site at www.found.ksu.edu/telefund.

New test measures students' tech skills

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Educational Testing Service, the distributor of standardized tests like the SATs and Advanced Placement exams, is piloting a new assessment that attempts to measure students' proficiency in technology.

The Information and Communication Technology Literacy Assessment is a performance-based assessment that will be used to measure students' "ability to use technology as a tool to research, organize, evaluate and communicate information, as well as understanding of the ethical and legal issues surrounding the access and use of information," according to the ETS Web site.

There are two versions of the exam — the Core Academic Assessment for high school students making the transition to college, and the Advanced Assessment for college students transferring to upper-level coursework.

It is being piloted in high schools and colleges in Texas,

Fossett's GlobalFlyer arrives in England

By Derek Kravitz
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANSTON, England — Fighting through sleep deprivation, severe turbulence and a last-gasp emergency landing, Steve Fossett broke the record for the longest nonstop flight in aviation history.

The 61-year-old adventurer piloted his lightweight experimental plane, Virgin Atlantic GlobalFlyer, to set a new record of 26,389 miles in about 76 hours despite a complete electronic failure that threatened to turn his glorious return into a nightmare.

Fossett put emergency landing procedures into action when a generator light started to flash upon his descent.

The mechanical crisis forced him to land Saturday at Bournemouth International Airport, in southern England, instead of his planned landing point in nearby Kent, where hundreds of well wishers were gathered to greet him.

"He burst two tires on landing and the poor GlobalFlyer had to be dragged off the runway," said Steve Ridgway, chief executive of Virgin Atlantic, the company sponsoring Fossett's record bid.

The Robin Macy Band performs to a large crowd Saturday night at the Manhattan Arts Center. Macy, who is said to be the fourth member of the Dixie Chicks, is one of the few performers the MAC will have perform this season.

Community members and students heard the music of Robin Macy, former member and founder of the country music group the Dixie Chicks, Saturday night at the Manhattan Arts Center, 1520 Poyntz Ave.

Macy said her experience with the group, which was formed in 1988, was a teaching one.

"Some of the things I learned about making a dream come true I attain to practice," she said.

Although she left the group in the early 1990s, Macy said being a part of the group still affects her today.

"The Dixie Chicks are the springboard for other creative endeavors, and I wish them health and happiness, but I wouldn't want to live my life with a body-guard," she said. "In many ways, I think the turn that fate took was a blessing for me because I enjoy my privacy but I can live a normal life, and it's something I really value."

Macy said her advice to aspiring singers and songwriters is to make sure the career is what they really want.

"They need to go somewhere that's quiet and spiritual and ask themselves deep down, 'How much am I willing to sacrifice for what I love?'" she said. "There are a million talented people who lack the tenacity and determination."

"It takes more than talent to make it in the music business. You have to have passion and drive and some lucky breaks."

Macy's band includes guitarist and mandolinist Kenny White, bassist Darren Wilcox and percussionist Rick Martinez on percussion. Macy is the lead vocalist and also plays guitar.

Macy performed a 90-minute set that included Woody Guthrie's "Pasture of Plenty" and "Living in the Gray," a political song she wrote after the 2004 presidential election.

Macy said she wrote "Living in the Cheney accidentally shoots hunter in Texas

By Lynn Brezovsky
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas — Vice President Dick Cheney accidentally shot and wounded a companion during a weekend quail hunting trip in Texas, spraying the fellow hunter in the face and chest with shotgun pellets.

Harry Whittington, a millionaire attorney from Austin, was in stable condition in the intensive care unit of a Corpus Christi hospital on Sunday, according to Yvonne Wheeler, spokeswoman for the Christus Spohn Health System.

The incident occurred Saturday at a ranch in south Texas where the vice president and two companions were hunting quail.

It was not reported publicly by the vice president's office for nearly 24 hours, and then only after the incident was reported locally by the Corpus Christi Caller-Times.

Katharine Armstrong, the ranch's owner, said Sunday that Cheney was using a 28-gauge shotgun and that Whittington was about 30 yards away when he was hit in the cheek, neck and chest.

Each of the hunters were wearing bright orange vests at the time, Armstrong told reporters at the ranch about 60 miles southwest of Corpus Christi. She said Whittington was "alert and doing fine."

Armstrong, in an interview with The Associated Press, said emergency personnel traveling with Cheney tended to Whittington before an ambulance — routinely on call because of the vice president's presence — took him to the hospital.

Cheney's spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride, said the vice president met with Whittington and his wife at the hospital on Sunday. Cheney "was pleased to see that he's doing fine and in good spirits," she said.

Armstrong said she was watching from a car while Cheney, Whittington and another hunter got out of the vehicle to shoot at a covey of quail.

Whittington shot a bird and went to look for it in the tall grass, while Cheney and the third hunter walked to another spot and discovered a second covey.

Whittington "came up from behind the vice president and the other hunter and didn't signal them or indicate to them or announce himself," Armstrong said.

"The vice president didn't see him," she continued. "The covey flushed and the vice president picked out a bird and was following it and shot. And by god, Harry was in the line of fire and got peppered pretty good."

Whittington has been a private practice attorney in Austin since 1950 and has long been active in Texas Republican politics. He has been appointed to several state boards, including when then-Gov. George W. Bush named him to the Texas Funeral Service Commission.

— Nedra Pickler reported from Washington. Associated Press writer Paul J. Weber in Dallas contributed to this report.

Al-Jaafari to head Iraq

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Shiite lawmakers Sunday chose incumbent Ibrahim al-Jaafari to be Iraq's new prime minister, taking a key step in forming a government nearly two months after national elections, officials said. Al-Jaafari is assured the post because Shiites won the most parliament seats in the Dec. 15 national elections.

7 things you didn't know 7 days ago

Kwan withdraws from Olympics

Dressed in black, her eyes red and swollen from crying, Michelle Kwan flashed none of the spark and charisma the world has come to admire. Her smile did little to hide her misery.

"I've had a great career. I've been very lucky," she said, pausing to compose herself. Everywhere but at the Olympics.

Kwan's last chance to win an Olympic gold ended Sunday when she withdrew from the Turin Games because of a groin injury.

Emily Hughes, younger sister of 2002 Olympic champion Sarah Hughes, replaced Kwan on the U.S. team and will join national champion Sasha Cohen and Kimmie Meissner.

ARCHAEOLOGISTS DISCOVER TOMB

Archaeologists have unearthed a massive tomb in the northern Greek town of Pella, capital of the ancient kingdom of Macedonia and birthplace of Alexander the Great.

The eight-chambered tomb dates to the Hellenistic Age between the fourth and second century B.C. and is the largest of its kind ever found in Greece.

The 678-square-foot tomb hewn out of rock was discovered by a farmer plowing his field on the eastern edge of the ancient cemetery of Pella, some 370 miles north of Athens, archaeologists said.

BIRD FLU IN ITALY, GREECE, BULGARIA

Bird flu has reached Western Europe, with Italy and Greece announcing Saturday they had detected the H5N1 strain of the virus in dead swans.

Italian officials said the virus had only affected wild birds and posed no immediate risk to people.

No human infections were reported in the three countries.

BUSH FACES OPPOSITION TO FEES

President Bush hates new taxes, that's for sure.

But tell that to airline passengers, higher-income veterans and owners of freighters using the St. Lawrence Seaway. They are among those hit up for billions of dollars under his new budget plan.

The spending proposal for the budget year that begins Oct. 1 contains $3.5 billion in new user fees.

The fees would swell to $47.2 billion over five years.

IRAQI KIDNAPPERS SET DEADLINE

Kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll have threatened to kill her if their demands are not met by Feb. 26, the owner of a Kuwaiti TV station that has aired a new tape of the hostage said Friday.

Al Rai satellite station owner Jassem Boudai said the kidnappers set more specific demands than the release of all Iraqi women from prison. Boudai refused to elaborate.

U.S. ENDS MOCK INTERNET ATTACKS

The government concluded its "Cyber Storm" wargame Friday, its biggest-ever exercise to test how it would respond to devastating attacks over the Internet from anti-globalization activists, underground hackers and bloggers.

Participants confirmed parts of the worldwide simulation challenged government officials and industry executives to respond to deliberate misinformation campaigns and activist calls by Internet bloggers.

The Department of Homeland Security promised a full report on results from the exercise by summer.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY SEPARATES BLACK AND HISPANIC INMATES

Los Angeles County jail officials separated black and Hispanic inmates, began transferring troublemakers out and brought in clergy to try to restore peace after a week of racially charged brawls they feared would continue to erupt through the weekend.

Comic strip artist offers peek into grad students' lives

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jorge Cham talked about everything from procrastination to research when he addressed an audience Friday evening in the K-State Student Union's Little Theatre.

Cham is the creator of the Ph.D. comics, "Piled Higher and Deeper," often referred to as the "Dilbert" of academia.

"Nothing excites an academic more than clever acronyms," Cham said.

An alumnus of Stanford University, Cham now works as a part-time instructor at the California Institute of Technology. He is on a trans-America tour of universities, giving talks and signing copies of his books.

The evening began with a brief introduction by Ron Trewyn, vice provost for research and dean of the Graduate School. Trewyn said Friday was the first time the Graduate Student Council had brought a speaker and sponsored a university-wide event.

During the speech, "Power of Procrastination," Cham, with the help of some statistics and research, tried to convince graduate students why it is OK to procrastinate.

"In the process of taking classes, grading papers and working on research projects, grad students get buried in pop culture," Cham said.

He started off showing the crowd a glimpse of his doctoral research as an engineer at Stanford University — a short video clip of experiments on cockroach-like robots, which brought peals of laughter from the audience.

"My research represents what grad school felt like," he said. "Running frantically, but not getting anywhere."

Cham started creating comic strips in his days as a graduate student at Stanford. These strips first appeared in the university's newspaper and later in various other newspapers, finally going online in 1997.

"Slowly over the years, the comic has spread like a virus," Cham said. "The misery wasn't just limited to Stanford."

Bala Thiagarajan, president of the Graduate Student Council and graduate student in biology, said she has read the Ph.D. comics for years and knew Cham would make a good campus wide speaker.

The characters in the comic are roughly representative of graduate students. The four main characters are the protagonist, a nameless hero in one of the hard sciences; Michael Slackenemy, the eternal slacker; Cecilia, representative of the less than 10 percent of women in computer science; and Tejal, the activist and student in humanities.

The comics, Cham said, address, among other things, thoughts inside the minds of graduate students, like free food, keeping one's adviser happy and dealing with undergraduates.

Cham went on to quote some serious research conducted by the University of California — Berkeley about how graduate students felt.

"Ninety-five percent of the grad students say that they have felt overwhelmed, and 67 percent confess that they are hopeless or depressed," Cham said.

Addressing the topic of procrastination, Cham joked about how its meaning often gets mixed up with that of its "close cousin," laziness.

"Laziness is when you don't want to do anything," he said. "Procrastination is when you don't want to do anything now."

Cham said graduate students felt less bright in a class filled with high-caliber people and that students fear failure and moving on.

"My professor at Stanford said there's nothing you 'have' to do," Cham said. "Anything you do is something you 'want' to do. So relax, enjoy it and listen to your inner procrastinator."

Cham advised students to embrace procrastination but told them to be wary of it turning into laziness. He also told students it is OK to have low expectations and they were not alone when doing so.

"Before entering grad school, I always felt at the top of my class," said Melissa Hull, graduate student in college student personnel. "There's not a day I leave before 5 p.m. because there's always something to be done."

Hull said she thought there was a lot of truth in Cham's presentation.

"His talk was truthful and well-delivered," she said. "I am going to start reading his comics."

Bo Yang, graduate student in curriculum and instruction, said the lecture resonated with the life she is leading as a graduate student.

"I absolutely loved his talk," she said. "It was exactly how my life is. He's lived the experience we're now living."

The presentation was followed by a book-signing, where Cham's books were sold for $10 each. There was also a graduate student mixer in the Staterooms.

Design expo will feature jobs, more than 70 architecture firms

By Lacey Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Architecture and design students looking for an easy way to find the perfect job or internship can find it at the College of Architecture, Planning and Design's sixth annual DesignExpo today.

The event will be from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

The DesignExpo allows students to contact professionals in the business and hear about work being done in their field of study.

Diane Potts, assistant to the dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, said this year's DesignExpo will include 73 firms, the highest number the event has had.

Potts said firms had to be turned down for the event, but because of the high response, another expo will occur later in the semester with at least 30 firms.

"It's the maximum number we could squeeze into the Union Ballroom," Potts said.

She said K-State students have been in high demand and several of the firm's representatives are K-State alumni.

"It's an opportunity for students looking for jobs and younger students looking for internships," Potts said. "It's a really good opportunity to meet with a wide array of firms."

The event's committee, made up of faculty and staff as well as students in various disciplines of the college, has worked hard to promote the event and explain to students how helpful the day can be, Potts said.

"We've tried to encourage and help them to understand how important this is," she said.

Jayne Jones, senior in landscape architecture, said older students looking for jobs or internships should bring portfolios and résumés, but even if students do not bring any of their work, meeting with the firms can be important to their future.

"I think it's a great opportunity and the easiest way for students to find internships," Jones said. "I'm especially excited about meeting with employers."

Jenny West, fifth-year senior in interior architecture, has worked on the DesignExpo committee for two years and said the day is important for students to see how their degree will lead them into the working world.

"It's a really good opportunity for us to get contacts," West said. "A lot of people have gotten jobs from it."

West said going to the DesignExpo is one of the easiest ways for students to understand the workforce and speak with representatives in a comfortable environment.

"It's a priceless experience," West said. "It's the best opportunity for a student to interact with firms in a casual way."

TO THE POINT Literary tests inconvenience college students

We live in a world surrounded by computers and technological marvels. Because of this, today's students have more access to more information than ever before.

We are being introduced to information and computer technology at an ever-younger age, and by the time most kids hit middle school, they often are already more technologically knowledgeable than the previous generation.

This makes The Educational Testing Service's idea of an Information and Communication Technology Literary Assessment ludicrous, especially for college-aged students.

A test to determine high school and collegiate students' technological literacy is 10 years too late, as the proposed testing ideas are no longer new to our society, and the test would have to be updated continually due to technological advancements.

High school students take enough standardized tests as it is, and expecting a college student to voluntarily take a test is absurd, with everything that already weighs on a college student's mind.

Further burdening students with an unnecessary test that a company stands to profit from is not the way to go about it.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

You've all seen her: the over-zealous Cindy Sheehan waging a war against the United States for its war against terrorism.

She started her so-far-ineffective campaign against the Bush administration, last year.

I saw bits and pieces of her attempt at chaos in the newspapers I received from my family while I was serving in Iraq.

I recently found out she was contemplating a run for the U.S. Senate against Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.

I was first excited at the thought of no Feinstein in the Senate, and consequently one fewer hack liberal to mentally drain me with more mindless nonsense about a war she has never seen.

This feeling of excitement, however, quickly faded as the word "Sheehan" made its imprint on my mind.

Sheehan is doing everything in her power to get troops out of Iraq. She's been led to believe we should not be there. That belief is simply wrong.

In Sheehan, the average conservative sees a love/hate dichotomy. These conflicting feelings are only briefly mutual.

When first introduced to Sheehan's story, you cannot help but sympathize with the mother of a dead soldier. You pity her and esteem her for the sacrifice she has made for her country.

My experience in Iraq allows a special place in my heart for the loved ones of dead military men and women. I know how helpless she must have felt.

She could send a million letters and never be sure he would see any of them. All she could do was wait and see.

These sympathetic feelings, however, can only go so far. They make a quick turn to the negative.

When liberals see Sheehan, they see another loud person who agrees with them. When a conservative sees her, it's slightly different.

We conservatives see a woman behind the façade of a dead soldier/son exploiting it for more than it's worth. I know I sound cold-hearted, but I simply don't understand the legitimacy of her credentials.

My friend Cody is a chemical engineer, but that doesn't mean I am an expert in karate. I know that sounds like it doesn't make sense, but it is the same situation.

Her son was a soldier, not an expert on foreign policy and the state of our nation.

Granted, he has an infinitely better perspective on the Iraq situation than Feinstein and other groundless liberals, but as far as the intricacies of the United States and its foreign policy is concerned, he is at least once-removed from the facts, taking her out of the entire ballpark of truth.

And what makes her and the rest of the liberal United States so sure the soldiers want to come home anyway?

My experience tells a story of U.S. forces that believe in what they're doing. They see little children with a hope and chance for a future. They see broken homes holding the broken hearts of an oppressed nation with a plea in their eyes that implores us to keep trying to help.

The United States, regardless of initial right or wrong, is now a pillar holding a fragile country. It cannot be removed.

That's what I saw. That's what the CNN propaganda machine refuses to show Feinstein and Sheehan and the other liberal Americans.

With all of that said, you can rest assured knowing Sheehan announced last Thursday she will not run for the Senate. And know that with Feinstein things at least are not as bad as they could have been.

Pharmacists should help with contraceptive

Since Valentine's Day is Tuesday and couples everywhere will get together for that special night, the conflict with the morning after pill and certain pharmacists not giving them out has made the news again.

I was watching one of my favorite programs, "The Daily Show," last Thursday and there was a bit on the pill. But producers couldn't really ask the question every person wants to know: why do people feel they need to impose their beliefs on someone else?

In this case, pharmacists are refusing women the right to choose what happens in their bodies the morning after an "accident" because of the pharmacists' beliefs.

This doesn't mean women should be allowed to have abortions through a pill - I am not talking about that.

What I am saying is, if an accident occurs during sexual intercourse, and the woman is responsible enough to seek medical help, she should be allowed to receive that pill. The pharmacist is not her parent or her significant other, and he or she should not be allowed to decide whether a woman can take a pill that stops her from getting pregnant.

That is all the pill does - it stops a woman from getting pregnant.

According to www.morningafterpill.org, the pill is a high dosage birth control pill. I don't see pharmacists refusing to prescribe those, so there really isn't much of a difference there.

It is a woman's right to protect herself and choose what is best for her body.

In the pharmacist's Code of Ethics, it does not state something like, "a pharmacist may choose to give out medication for any illness." In fact, according to www.aphanet.org/pharmcare/ethics.com, the Code of Ethics says a pharmacist "places concern for the well-being of the patient at the center of professional practice." The code also says, "In all cases, a pharmacist respects personal and cultural differences among patients."

Wait, doesn't that mean a pharmacist isn't doing his job when he refuses a patient medication?

If women wanted an opinion on the emergency contraception pill, they could go to their doctor, who, in most cases, knows more about the medication than the pharmacist does.

I worry if the medical profession continues on this path, giving each medical practitioner a right to decide what is best for their patients based on religion, we soon won't have doctors helping patients with cancer.

A doctor could argue it is God's plan for the cancer patient to die, and he or she does not want to interfere with His plan.

I know that is a bit exaggerated, but why should a pharmacist be able to choose any medication - to any person?

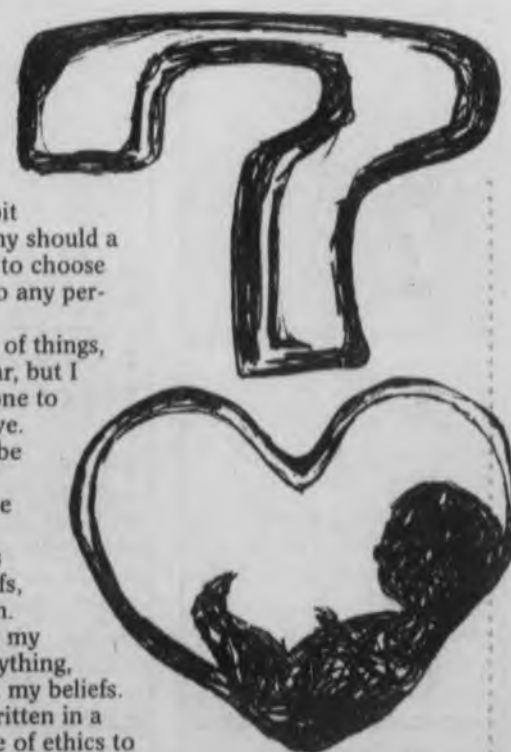

I believe in a lot of things, religious and secular, but I don't expect everyone to follow what I believe.

In fact, it might be boring if everyone believed in the same thing. All of my friends have different beliefs, and I still love them. I would never deny my friend help with anything, even if it countered my beliefs. I think that is written in a human being's code of ethics to help people.

So why should a pharmacist be any different?

Eagle Scout earns rank with historical marker

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There is a new chunk of limestone in front of the Riley County Courthouse.

It is a historical marker that also serves as a stepping stone for local Boy Scout Eli Logan, of Troop 74 in Manhattan, who organized its installation for his Eagle Scout service project.

To earn the rank of Eagle Scout, a scout must complete a service project he organized himself. Logan's project has given him plenty of work over the past year, Brad Logan, Eli's father and research associate professor in sociology, anthropology and social work, said.

"Probably a lot more than he thought when he got started with it," Brad Logan said.

Eli Logan, a freshman at Manhattan High School's east campus, said he got the idea after seeing a similar marker outside the Douglas County Courthouse in Lawrence, but the one he installed at the Riley County Courthouse was somewhat larger. He said the stone weighed between 1,500 and 2,000 pounds.

"The stonework is significant," Eli said of the courthouse. "It's seen in a lot of courthouses from that time period."

The stone bears a bronze plaque that lists information about the building's construction and history, and tells that it is listed on the National Register of Historic Places, which is kept by the National Park Service.

According to the National Park Service Web site, the building is not yet listed. Eli said it was listed on the Kansas register and might not yet have been added to the national list online.

"It's on the plaque now, so it better be," he said.

Eli said his plan originally included adding flags to all the downtown businesses, but ruled it out after a discussion with former Kansas legislator Jessie Branson.

He said the flowers he planted for the project around the stone will bloom this spring.

The stone arrived Friday morning atop a Bayer Construction Company, Inc., truck mounted with a hydraulic crane.

Burke Bayer, owner of Bayer Construction Company, Inc., 120 Deep Creek Road, and employees Pat Briggs and Stan Hambright carried out most of the actual placing of the stone.

"That stone's fragile, even though it's harder than, you know," Briggs said.

The stone's installation came with help from several area businesses and organizations.

Bayer Stone Inc., 509 Fair Lane, gave Eli a discount on the limestone, and Bayer Construction Company, Inc. pitched in with the installation. Also, Degginger's Foundry in Topeka gave a discount on the bronze plaque for the stone and Atwood Rentals, 1927 Fort Riley Blvd., lent him equipment to prepare the site for free.

Eli also received financial help with an $800 grant from the Center for Youth as Resources, $200 from the Manhattan Rotary Club and $50 from Lewis Fuertes, Manhattan resident.

Eli also credited several city and county officials for their help in the project as well as his parents.

"It's been exciting," said Lauren Ritterbush, Logan's mother and associate professor of anthropology and social work. "Eli's a fairly mature kid — he chose this project on his own."

Pat Briggs and Stan Hambright, employees at Bayer Construction, help to position a stone monument Friday morning in front of the Riley County Courthouse. The placement of the new stone was organized by Eli Logan, a local Boy Scout, as a part of his Eagle Scout Service Project.

Arts and Sciences to recognize students

By Lacey Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Exceptional students and faculty who might have slipped through the cracks will soon be recognized by the Arts and Sciences Student Council's new program, student and faculty of the month.

Adam Kretzer, senior in biochemistry, is president of the Arts and Sciences Council and said the student and faculty of the month was a concept to help make the Arts and Sciences Council more active in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Kretzer said one student will be chosen each month based on work and improvement in the classroom.

"Students may get rewarded in the classroom, but in other ways other students don't see," Kretzer said. "It's a way for students to stand out."

Faculty will nominate students, but the students can also nominate faculty and staff members who have provided extra help and resources in and outside of the classroom. Kretzer said having students and faculty involved in the nominating process makes the honor more meaningful.

Kretzer said he hoped rewarding students and faculty each month for their service and work would encourage people from all disciplines within the college to be in-involved.

"We encourage people from all departments to fill them out," Kretzer said.

Applications for nominating a student of the month or faculty of the month can be found in the College of Arts and Sciences' main office in Eisenhower 117.

Although Kretzer said some details about the processing are still being discussed, applications for one month will be due the last day of the previous month and can be turned in at Eisenhower 117 or at the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Kretzer said members of the Arts and Sciences Council will review the applications and pick one student and one faculty member.

"The main thing we're looking for is students that really stand out," Kretzer said.

Danielle English, sophomore in Mass Communications, said being in such a big college made it difficult at times to hear about activities and accomplishments of other students.

"It's hard to know everyone because arts and sciences covers so many fields," English said. "You don't really talk to people outside your niche."

Focusing on students and faculty each month would also help bring a sense of unity to the college, English said.

Several options exist for holiday gifts

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuesday, Valentine's Day, is a popular time for individuals to show their appreciation of special someone.

"I like Valentine's Day gifts that are very simple," Alicia Horvath, senior in marketing, said. "Depending on the relationship status, card and boxers for a guy are good ideas and (for women) a single flower, a card and chocolate."

A lot of customers hit retail stores looking for that perfect present, said Kelly Yoder, sales manager at Bath and Body Works.

"We've definitely had lots of men coming in looking confused and asking for help," Yoder said.

Many stores are offering sales and gift sets just for Valentine's Day because they see an increase in sales, Yoder said.

"Gift sets are an easy way to pick something out," Yoder said. "We have sets that are made especially for Valentine's Day. One of my favorites is a vase-shaped container that has X's and O's on it. We are also having our 'Lip Event' — all of our lip glosses are $5."

Salespeople are good resources when it comes to recommending great gift ideas for men who are unsure about what to buy their loved one, Carly Baltes, sales manager at Victoria's Secret, said. Besides chocolate and flowers, lingerie and underwear are popular choices.

"We (are recommending) two brand-new push-up bras from the 'Very Sexy' line," Baltes said.

A lot of stores that seem to stay busy around the holiday are Acme Gifts and other specialty stores in Aggieville, Coach House Gifts or other chain stores in the Manhattan Town Center, jewelers and floral shops.

Many gift sets or arrangements can range from $5 to $100, depending on what type of gift you are looking for.

Even though stores are willing to help people find gifts, many couples exchange homemade gifts.

"Making cookies, a card or dinner are good ideas," Horvath said.

Has anyone seen Coggins?

After the K-State women's 71-66 loss to Iowa State Saturday, a peek at the stat sheet revealed something downright disturbing.

Junior guard Claire Coggins played five minutes in the second half. Not only that, Coggins wasn't in the game at the end when K-State was trying to make a comeback from being down 67-60.

Many K-State fans sought an explanation as to why K-State's best player was not on the court at a time when the Wildcats needed her most.

Coggins is K-State's leading scorer, averaging 13.2 points per game prior to Saturday. She is one of the most seasoned players on Coach Deb Patterson's roster, and she absolutely torched the Cyclones for 21 points in K-State's 73-64 win Jan. 29 at Iowa State.

With a close game at home against a Big 12 Conference opponent, it would seem logical to have Coggins in the game.

Patterson was specifically asked why Coggins played just five minutes in a second half in which the Cyclones started on a 20-4 run and held off a late K-State rally. Patterson said she wanted players who were bringing more energy, aggressiveness and rebounding to be on the floor.

Never mind that Coggins is routinely one of K-State's best defenders, has 28 steals on the season and is hitting a career-high 38 percent of her 3-pointers. Let's move on.

When asked to further explain, Patterson skirted around the issue with this long-winded answer:

"Anytime you're playing a Big 12 game, you're going to see ebbs and flows and high and lows from your players relative to their matchups, and certainly, I think, I'd like to look at our stat line down the roster and say that we were more productive. I'd like to look at everybody's rebounds and everybody's field goal attempts and makes, and say we were more productive."

"I wouldn't single out any one player because I do think we're talented enough as a basketball team to answer. We should be. It's tough when you're not getting that overall production that you have to have to be successful."

"If you look at our numbers, I think you'll see we all struggled there. We all missed a lot of, well, most players missed what we might call lay-up opportunities, and after missing a few of those, we began to take a couple, during the segment where we struggled, we took some shots that were too hard, and we began pressing a little bit."

"Then we got into young mistakes of taking shots that were harder than we ultimately could have gotten. It's tough when we're not all there on our best game, and tonight, we talked about that in the locker room. We weren't all there, five across the board, with our basketball game. We needed to be to be able to handle what Iowa

Martin's shot long; Wildcats fall to Missouri

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Missouri lived up to Thomas Gardner's guarantee, as the Tigers defeated the Wildcats 74-71 Sunday at Mizzou Arena in Columbia, Mo.

In the process, Missouri snapped a six-game losing streak and won its first game against K-State in four tries.

With K-State trailing 74-71, junior forward Cartier Martin had a chance to send the game into overtime, but his three-point attempt caromed off the back rim at the buzzer.

Martin set a pick for sophomore guard Clint Stewart and rolled to the top of the key with four seconds remaining. Stewart hit Martin with a bounce pass after drawing a double team, and Martin put up virtually an uncontested shot.

"Whoever was the open guy was going to take the last shot," Martin said after the game. "I just so happened to pop out and get a good look at it. Part of why I missed was because I didn't expect to be so open."

A win would have moved K-State (13-8, 4-6) into a two-way tie for fifth place in the Big 12 Conference. Instead, the Wildcats fell into a three-way tie for seventh, alongside Iowa State and Texas Tech.

"In a way, if we want to make the postseason, we feel like we have to win out," Martin said.

Martin and sophomore guard David Hoskins combined for 22 of K-State's 29 first-half points, but the Wildcats trailed 31-29 at the break.

Hoskins finished 8-of-13 from the field for a game-high 20 points, while Martin tallied 19 points on 7-of-12 shooting. Junior guard Lance Harris added 18.

K-State held Missouri guard Gardner, to 11 points on 4-of-12 shooting. However, the Wildcats had trouble containing Missouri's post players, including forward Marshall Brown and center Kevin Young.

"We just kept trying to search and find a stretch of time — whether it be man or zone — that we could protect the paint and keep those guys farther

K-State's Marlies Gipson struggles to grab the ball away from Iowa State's Megan Ronhovde Saturday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats lost to the Cyclones, 71-66.

The third time was not a charm for the K-State Wildcats on Saturday.

With a 71-66 loss to the Iowa State Cyclones (14-5, 5-6 Big 12 Conference) in Bramlage Coliseum, K-State (17-6, 7-4) was unable to turn a two-game consecutive win streak into a three-game win streak for the third time during the Big 12 season.

Led by junior standout Lyndsey Medders, who missed the previous three games with injuries, the Cyclones used a 20-to-4 run in the first four minutes of the second half to give the Wildcats their third home loss of the season.

"When you are playing in a place like Bramlage that is respected as it is in the Big 12, you can't come out in the second half and just play 'you score, they score,'" said Medders, who scored 17 of her game-high 26 points in the second half. "You have to get stops and the biggest thing for us was just to get the scores."

After leading by as many as 12 points in the first half, the Wildcats struggled in the second half, shooting just 29 percent from the floor.

Coach Deb Patterson said she didn't have her team prepared coming out of the locker room against the Cyclones.

"From our point of view, we just came out so flat and passive out of the halftime," Patterson said. "I take responsibility for that. Something happened that we did not come out ready to compete and it's my job to have this team ready after halftime."

The second-half run by Iowa State was reminiscent of the Cyclones' 22-to-6 second-half run against the Wildcats on Jan. 29 in Ames, Iowa, that nearly propelled Iowa State to the win.

"It was an incredible run by Iowa State," Patterson said. "They were very aggressive, they played extremely confident, and it was

Men's golf team begins season with Florida competition

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today's forecast calls for a high of 65 degrees with some light wind and plenty of sunshine.

It might not be that warm in Manhattan, but these will be the conditions today and Tuesday when the K-State men's golf team tees off in its first tournament of the spring season. The Wildcats will begin 2006 competing against 13 other teams, including defending champion and host school Florida Southern, at the Matlock Invitational in sunny Lakeland, Fla.

The tournament will be played at the 7,065 yard, par 72 Grasslands Golf and Country Club.

The nicer weather in January has allowed K-State more time to practice outside than in years past, and coach Tim Norris said his team will use the extra outdoor practice as a psychological advantage going into this first tournament.

"We normally don't get to practice outside in January, and our first tournament of the spring is usually the first time the guys see grass," Norris said. "I think this is a huge advantage for them because now they feel more confident about their swings going into the first tournament."

This will be the third-straight year K-State has participated in the invitational, having success in both the 2004 and 2005 tournaments. In 2004, the Wildcats shot an 18-over 882 and placed fifth out of 15 teams. The Wildcats improved in 2005, tying for third in the 15-team field.

Senior Ben Kern will miss his first tournament in nearly two years, and fellow senior Tyler Cummins, junior Jay Kramer, sophomore Kyle Yonke and freshmen Joe Kinney and Robert Streb will look to continue the team's past success at the Matlock without their leader.

The last tournament Kern missed was the 2004 Matlock Collegiate. Kern had played in 24-straight tournaments prior to this week.

Norris said Kern is not playing because he wants to give the young guys as much tournament time as possible, and early in the season is the best time to do it.

NBA | Wade rallies Heat past Pistons in Miami

MIAMI — Dwyane Wade led the comeback and then the celebration, skipping along the sideline and high-fiving jubilant fans.

The Miami Heat finally showed it can beat the elite, especially when it has Wade as a weapon.

He scored the Heat's last 17 points, including the game-winner on a 16-footer with 2.3 seconds left, and the Heat edged the Detroit Pistons 100-98 on Sunday.

Touted before the season as title contenders, the Heat improved to 1-7 against the NBA's four top teams.

MLB | Sosa seriously considers retirement

MIAMI — Sammy Sosa is seriously considering retiring from baseball instead of accepting an offer from the Washington Nationals, a source close to the player said Sunday.

Sosa has not made a decision regarding the contract offer from Washington, which is a non-guaranteed, one-year pact for $500,000.

Washington's offer is the only one the Dominican slugger and potential Hall of Famer has received this winter.

With 588 career home runs, Sosa is the all-time leader among Latin American players. He had three years of 60 or more home runs between 1998 and 2001 as a Cub, becoming enormously popular in Chicago and throughout baseball.

TEN | Roddick sends U.S. to Davis Cup quarterfinals

SAN DIEGO — Andy Roddick beat Romania's Razvan Sabau in straight sets Sunday to send the United States into the Davis Cup quarterfinals.

The victory gave the United States an insurmountable 3-1 lead in the best-of-five opening round, then James Blake made the final 4-1 with his closing singles victory.

Blake and the doubles team of Mike and Bob Bryan provided the first two U.S. victories, then Blake capped the round with a 6-1, 7-5 win over Horia Tecau in what essentially was an exhibition match shortened to two sets.

The United States advanced to play Chile, which beat Slovakia in the first round.

NFL | Brooks' interception return for TD sparks NFC

HONOLULU — Derrick Brooks was just happy to be on the winning side for a change in the Pro Bowl. Being selected the game's outstanding player was a bonus.

Brooks and the NFL's so-called inferior conference something to feel good about Sunday, making the big plays in a sloppy 23-17 victory in a game that featured 10 turnovers — six by the favored AFC.

Brooks, the Tampa Bay linebacker playing in his ninth straight Pro Bowl, made the biggest play, returning an interception 59 yards for a touchdown. He received a car on the field shortly after the game ended.

"I stand real humble," Brooks said. "I've been here a few times, and I don't have many wins. It was just important for me to get the win."

Boldt, Carter want campus safety, lifetime ties to K-State

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ashley Boldt and Anthony Carter want students to call K-State home.

Boldt, junior in family studies and human services, filed Friday for student body president in Student Governing Association elections with running mate Carter, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education.

Boldt said the pair want to give back to the student body.

"We've been really lucky at the opportunities we've had and just the people we've met," Boldt said.

"We really feel that this is some place we've really given a lot of time to. We'd really like to take that extra step and represent the students, and just bring to K-State what we've been given ourselves," she said.

Boldt and Carter said they are centering the campaign around the slogan "A home connection."

"I think when you hear the word 'home', you think of someplace you really feel safe," Boldt said.

"We really feel that that's been our experience, having K-State be home to us, and we want to offer that to other students," she said.

The pair want to address safety, student aid, student services and lifetime ties to K-State.

Carter said safety is a concern that needs to be met. He and Boldt want to push for more streetlights off campus and create a safety director position in SGA.

"We want to make sure the students feel safe at home, that that base need is being taken care of," Carter said.

Many students experience difficulty receiving refund checks from financial aid in a timely manner.

Boldt said she and Carter want to work with the cashier's office, the financial aid office and Varney's Book Store to make refund money available for students to buy books.

Carter said the pair hopes to begin a type of AAA service for students who need auto assistance.

Boldt said she and Carter also want to begin a widespread student-alumni mentorship program for students.

The bottom line of the campaign, Boldt said, are students in every part of K-State.

"All of those students are a part of K-State," Boldt said. "We want to try to be there for every student."

Collett, Mayfield work to prepare campaign platform

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ryan Collett, senior in kinesiology, and Emily Mayfield, sophomore in pre-professional elementary education, want to be in charge.

The two filed to run for the positions of president and vice president, respectively, of the student body Friday.

Collett is from Olathe, Kan., and Mayfield is from Overland Park, Kan. The pair met at St. Thomas Aquinas High School.

Collett said a run for student body president has been on his mind since he started at K-State.

"A lot of my friends, the last couple weeks, were saying 'You know, Ryan, you have been really thinking about it and talking about it for a long time. It is really your last chance to run for it so you might as well give it a shot," Collett said.

Mayfield said her goal is to improve the university experience for students.

"I love being at K-State so I kind of want to be, you know, held accountable for trying to make it better," she said.

The pair do not have a platform prepared yet, and said they are waiting to see what students say matters to them.

Collett said one possible goal would be to implement a tuition freeze so students pay the same for classes their freshman, sophomore, junior and senior years.

"Inflation happens over time and I think the last couple years we've caught up with where we need to be," Collett said.

He said another issue the two are considering would be stronger oversight of graduate teaching assistants, instructors and professors in classes that are taught by more than one; the goal is to have more consistency in teaching and grading in these classes.

"We're hoping to talk to Dean Bosco about these issues and more," Collett said.

Both are working on minors in leadership studies. Collett is in Pi Kappa Alpha, and Mayfield is in Gamma Phi Beta.

Collett said his passion is to follow through with his plans.

Mayfield said her passion is making sure everyone around her is enjoying themselves.

"I'm also passionate about making a difference," she said.

King, Besler platform includes tuition, parking, textbooks

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They are not just idea people, said student body vice-presidential candidate Emily Besler.

"We're running on action," she said.

Matt King and Besler, seniors in political science, filed Friday to run for student body president and vice president, respectively.

The duo, both three-year veterans of Student Governing Association, will campaign on a four-pronged platform of campus safety, academic excellence, the creation of a student pre-game section at Snyder Family Stadium and the "Big Three" issues of tuition, parking and textbooks.

King and Besler said they assembled their platform by consulting the student body and meeting with university administration.

The pair said their biggest concern is SafeRide.

"It's operating at capacity," King said. "There's just not enough taxis, not enough drivers, not enough time."

They propose to introduce a hybrid call system that would employ the current taxis and also larger passenger vehicles running on routes around Manhattan.

To promote academic excellence, Besler said she and King want to increase attendance at graduate teaching assistant workshops, increase student participation on panels that choose instructors and increase technology in classrooms.

The student pre-game section would be an area where students could enjoy live music, free food and prizes before football games.

"We want to focus on programs and things students can really see," Besler said. "Students have nothing in the game that is just theirs."

King and Besler's "Big Three" issues – tuition, parking and textbooks – are things always on students' minds, they said.

King said they will support the recommendation of the tuition task force and will work to break ground on the parking garage in nine to 12 months.

They also support a three-semester buy-back cycle on textbooks, arranged between students, administration and Varney's Book Store, that would lower students' net textbook costs.

"You'd be guaranteed your book will be used for three semesters," Besler said.

Running on a slogan of "Vision. Action. Results," King said he and Besler are the most efficient candidates.

"We're not just talking," he said. "We have these issues, these ideas, and we want to continue to produce results."

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Emily Besler, senior in political science, and Matt King, senior in political science, announce their candidacy for student body vice president and president, respectively. The pair filed on Friday and plan to address multiple issues, including tuition, parking and textbooks.

Wallisch, Hilburn voice support for SafeRide, Hale Library

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A clean slate.

This is how John Wallisch, junior in psychology, described his presidential campaign in Student Governing Association elections.

Wallisch and his running mate Steve Hilburn, sophomore in psychology, filed for office Feb. 3.

Wallisch and Hilburn had considered running for office last semester as a joke, but never acted on it until learning from an article recently published by the Collegian that no one had yet filed for the top SGA office.

"Funny story – we thought we were signing up for bowling league, but actually we were signing up to run for president and vice president," Wallisch said.

The pair plans on keeping their campaign low-key and isn't taking the campaign too seriously, Wallisch said.

"It's kind of a grassroots campaign, like Howard Dean, but without the scraping," he said.

While the pair does not have a campaign platform, there are specific issues they are interested in.

One of the projects Hilburn would like to address is the crow problem that exists by Ackert Hall, he said.

"They practically white-wash the sidewalks every night," Hilburn said.

On a more serious note, the candidates said they support the efforts of SafeRide and would like to see additional funding provided to this program.

"One of my friends in high school was killed by a drunk driver," Wallisch said, "I want to make sure that doesn't happen to anyone else."

The candidates also would like to allocate more funding to Hale Library, Wallisch said.

"The school spends so much money on little pet projects for administrators – that money should be going toward students," Hilburn said. "Students pay for everything with tuition, books and housing, and students aren't really seeing a lot of returns of that."

The pair also favors the wireless Internet networks that are being installed in the dorms, but doesn't support the proposed on-campus parking garage.

"We don't want to make it sound too serious because people will feel sorry for us if we lose," Hilburn said. "If they want to vote for us fine, if they don't, it's probably for the best."

Comatose Sharon undergoes 7th operation after stroke

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Doctors removed nearly 2 feet of Ariel Sharon's large intestines Saturday during emergency surgery, his seventh operation since suffering a debilitating stroke last month.

Surgeons managed to stabilize the comatose Israeli prime minister after initially fearing for his life, but the latest complication makes it even more unlikely he will recover.

Israelis closely followed their 77-year-old leader's latest ordeal, with TV stations repeatedly breaking into regular programming for updates, but the country already has come to terms with his departure from politics.

Sharon was rushed to surgery Saturday morning after doctors, who had noticed abdominal swelling, conducted a CT scan and a laparoscopy, or insertion of a small camera through the abdominal wall.

Mor-Yosef said Saturday's surgery was relatively simple and that Sharon's main medical problem continues to be the coma. Asked whether Sharon could come out of the coma, Mor-Yosef said: "All possibilities remain open, but with each passing day, the chances are lower."

Since the stroke, Sharon has been hooked up to feeding and breathing tubes.

MACY | Series attracts artists to Manhattan

Gray" after realizing how divided the country is.

"As long as everyone is so polarized, we're never going to meet in the middle," she said. "Until we can look for the truth, whatever it is, and not be sabotaged by propaganda, we won't be unified."

The concert was part of the BirdHouse Acoustic Music Series, which was founded by David Kamerer in 1995.

"What we do is we bring in national touring songwriters and try to present them in a high quality concert environment for patrons who want to enjoy music front and center and not be in a bar," Kamerer said.

Finding artists willing to perform in Manhattan is never a problem, Kamerer said.

"At the time, we were sick of driving to Lawrence to see high quality music," he said. "Right at that time, people were really starting to use the Internet and it became possible to communicate with an artist. We just started asking people what it would take them to come to Manhattan and it was easier than we thought."

The series has taken place for several years in the Manhattan Arts Center. Kamerer said one of the major issues was finding a venue.

"Finding the artists wasn't a big problem, so we needed to find a home," he said. "We tried bars and coffee shops, and K-State had some rooms, but when this room became available, we knew that we had something that would be successful that people would respond to."

The performance, Kamerer said, is a moving event for patrons.

Mark Foley, professor of music at Wichita State University, works through a set opening for Robin Macy on Saturday night at the Manhattan Arts Center.

"The songwriter presents their work and they tend to do it in a stripped down bare way, and the song has no place to hide," he said. "When that song rises up and meets the audience and makes a connection just for one of those moments, that's why we do it."

Page Klug, graduate student in biology, said she has liked bluegrass music for about 10 years.

"I had a job in West Virginia, and there were a lot of community bluegrass festivals that I would go to," she said. "I thought the music tonight was very well done."

TESTING | Assessment not piloted in Kansas yet

West Virginia, Michigan and Arkansas, among other states.

"As we worked with ETS to preview the test, we really liked that it's a performance-based test and allows the test taker to actually demonstrate how they would use those skills in a real-world environment," said Anita Givens, senior director for instructional materials and educational technology at the Texas Education Agency.

Givens said all high school students in Texas are required to take technology classes in order to graduate. She said thinks that the courses outline "what we think every student should be able to do in order to function in any environment."

The assessment isn't being piloted in Kansas, but that doesn't mean it or something similar never will be.

"I absolutely think it's a good idea," said Randy Martin, Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school board president. "Children - actually, all of us - have to learn to apply the technology in our lives, and the only way we can start to do that is to know where we're at. I don't know much about this specific project, but I think it's logical to find out where students are standing in order to help educate them."

Givens said the test probably would be most useful for high schools, especially to stay in accordance with the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001, which says students should be "technologically literate" by the time they graduate.

"But it perhaps would be helpful to administer this type of assessment toward college freshmen," she said.

According to an ETS article titled "Succeeding in the 21st Century: What higher education must do to address the gap in ICT proficiencies," an assessment that will make it possible to determine whether college students have obtained the combination of technical and cognitive skills needed to be productive members of an information-rich, technology-based society is "urgently needed."

"Higher education faculty and administrators, in particular, need such data in order to gauge the effectivetiveness of current teaching strategies and curricula," the article said.

Dan Andresen, associate professor of computing and information sciences, said he thinks administering a test like this to college freshmen could be useful.

"I think it probably wouldn't be a bad idea," he said, "but I would want it to focus more on critical reasoning skills, rather than software-specific skills."

Andresen said he would be "particularly concerned, at the high school level, about yet another test taking up more learning time."

segment where we not only wasted possessions, offensively, but we didn't make stops."

Junior Twiggy McIntyre scored 11 of her 14 points in about four minutes to give the Wildcats a 57-54 lead with 3:43 remaining.

"I was really impressed with our basketball team, that they recovered from it and put themselves in position to compete to win the game," Patterson said.

McIntyre hit one more three-pointer seconds later, but a three by Iowa State senior Brittany Wilkins tied the game at 60-60 with 2:19 to play.

K-State was unable to convert on its next possession and was forced to foul. Medders went on to hit 9-of-10 from the free-throw line in the final 90 seconds to seal the win for the Cyclones.

"The coaches and our team have done a really good job of helping us adapt and to realize in the Big 12, that every night you need to be willing to bring it for 40 minutes and tonight we didn't do that," said freshman Shalee Lehning, who had 10 assists against Iowa State.

K-State will have a week off before traveling to Lincoln, Neb., on Saturday to take on the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

GOLF | Team works to use leader's absence as an opportunity

Cummins said he knows he must step up his game in Kern's absence and lead this team of younger players.

He is the only Wildcat participating this week who played in last year's tournament, tying for 41st, and said he is hoping to use his knowledge of the course to help guide his teammates to a solid finish.

"Ben is our leader, and with him not here I know that I have to be the one that steps up and plays three good rounds for the team," Cummins said. "Having played here before is a huge advantage for me because I can show the younger guys where to hit shots during the practice rounds."

Kinney, who earned honorable mention honors to the Rolex Junior All-American team, the American Junior Golf Association announced Oct. 25, said he is looking at this week as an opportunity for the rest of the guys to be the low man for the Wildcats.

"Not having Ben is a loss because he is the best player on our team," Kinney said. "But this gives us all an opportunity to be the one who takes charge and fills in for him in his absence."

"We know that we must all take our games to the next level, and hopefully we can all do that and have a successful tournament."

GLOBALFLYER | Fossett again breaks aviation world record

Fossett had broken the distance record of 24,987 miles as his plane flew over Shannon, Ireland, after crossing the Atlantic Ocean, his ground team said.

That eclipsed the 1986 record set by the lightweight Voyager aircraft, piloted by Dick Rutan and Jeana Yeager. It also beats the balloon record of 25,361 miles set in 1999 by the Breitling Orbiter 3.

Fossett was presented with the Guinness World Record for the longest flight in history. Branson, who was beaming with pride throughout the conference, said Fossett's record was a superhuman effort.

"He's just flown further than man, or woman, has ever flown," said Branson.

Fossett already holds the record for flying solo around the globe in a balloon and for being the first person to circle the globe solo in a plane without stopping or refueling. That flight last year lasted 67 hours and was hampered by a fuel leak.

State brought to the floor." I'm calling Patterson's bluff on this one.

There is no reason Coggins should have sat on the bench Saturday at the end of the game.

None.

Period.

Patterson herself admitted her team broke down because of youth. It's right there in her answer. So why was Coggins on the bench?

Quite frankly, it should be a little unsettling for K-State fans.

It seems there's more to this situation than rebounds and aggression, and that's too bad, because Coggins, along with veterans Twiggy McIntyre and Jessica McFarland, gives the Wildcats their best chance to pull out close victories this year down the stretch.

Police search for city funds

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department has initiated a criminal investigation into funds missing from the Manhattan City Parks and Recreation Department.

The City of Manhattan contacted the RCPD and asked for assistance investigating the suspicious initial findings of internal spot audits and other internal findings.

The spot audits revealed that a significant amount of funds were unaccounted for from the Parks and Recreation Department, specifically, the Recreation Division, a RCPD press release said.

City Manager Ron Fehr said in the release that he was disgusted by the situation.

"The city will continue to assist and cooperate fully with RCPD in any way that we can," Fehr said. "In addition, the city is conducting its own investigation."

"Any personnel actions necessary resulting from the investigations will be conducted swiftly and professionally. No matter the dollar amount, if an employee stole or misappropriated public funds, they need to be dealt with appropriately. The public needs to have confidence that its city operations are operating efficiently, effectively and accurately."

Many of the problems with deposits occurred within outlying areas within the Recreation Division, Terry DeWeese, Director of Parks and Recreation, said.

Some of these areas included the ice rink and concessions operations, he said.

"What we are trying to do is apply more levels of accountability," he said.

The levels include tightening control of the deposits, DeWeese said.

"We're tightening up our constraints," he said.

There already is an accountant in the Public Works Department, and one at the airport, but the Finance Department has added another to Parks and Recreation, Bernie Hayen, director of Finance, said.

The Finance Department was planning to add another accountant to the Parks and Recreation Department, but recent events have altered their plans, Hayen said.

"This kind of situation kind of sped that up," Hayen said.

Tens of thousands of dollars may have been lost, Fehr said in the RCPD press release, but Hayen disputes that number.

Local business offers creative, alternative Valentine's Day activity

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A local business offers a different way to show someone you care by painting a dish together.

Ceramic Canvas, 1344 Westloop Plaza, has been open for four years. It is a place where people can go in and paint anything from mugs to statues and have them fired in a kiln so they can be used for eating or drinking.

This is the third Valentine's Day the studio has offered specials for couples. For $35, couples can pick between five different packages. The packages include two different pieces such as mugs and dinner plates or a chip and dip platter.

Mike Vogt, senior in history, said painting a ceramic mug allowed him to spend time with his friends. "It's a good chance to make something that I can use," he said.

Vogt, along with Ian Hulon, junior in pre-professional secondary education; Ashley Clayton, senior in political science; and Megan Brown, student at Manhattan Christian College, painted different pieces at Ceramic Canvas on Saturday afternoon.

Hulon said painting the pieces brought back memories.

"It reminds me of something I did as a kid," he said. "I like that you don't have to have artistic ability to do this. You can point to it and say, 'I made that.'"

Owner Michelle Klentz said she got the idea for the shop from memories of her childhood and after visiting a similar studio in Virginia Beach, Va.

"My grandmother had a ceramic shop in Omaha Neb. when I was growing up," she said. "I loved the concept, but I had never seen it before visiting Virginia. I thought it was something Manhattan would like."

Klentz said although she makes about 50 percent of the pieces customers paint, she does have help in supplying.

"I buy what I don't make from importers," she said. "The pieces come from factories in Italy. I get the paint from a place in Kansas City."

Student teachers work despite lack of compensation

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Janae Brady, senior in English education, arrives at 7 a.m. at Wamego Middle School to begin another day of student teaching.

Brady said she stays at the school until 4 p.m. before she drives back to Manhattan.

During a semester of student teaching, education students are still required to pay tuition for their time learning in the classroom.

This extra cost is not hidden, Brady said, but it can make costs in the semester hard to pay.

"It was well-known to us in the beginning," Brady said. "It's hard to make ends meet, but at the same time, I feel like I'm still a student at K-State."

Brady said student teaching makes any other employment difficult, but many people are aware about the need to watch costs for that semester.

"The thing that's hard is a lot of added expenses," Brady said. "But a lot of people had time to save up and prepare for it."

Michael Holen, dean of the College of Education, said university overseers are in the schools, supervising student teachers.

"They're heavily supervised," he said. "They're paying for the supervision."

Holen said the College of Education works with the various schools to explain what the university expects from student teachers.

"We've worked for a number of years to develop a set of standards," Holen said. "They need to demonstrate they know what they're doing in there."

In past semesters, Holen said student teachers were only able to spend a few weeks in the classroom and were unable to really get a feel for how to work in the classroom.

Students now spend a semester in the school, but, Holen said, that time might make prices add up.

"It's one of the most expensive and intensive parts of the program, not one of the least," Holen said.

Holen said paying student teachers also is against state regulation, so putting students on a salary is not a possibility.

"It isn't an internship," Holen said. "The level of supervision required doesn't constitute an internship."

Nicole Gilgus, senior in elementary education, will begin student teaching in the fall and said the process can be difficult but has to be done.

"It's a little surprising because it's more like a job," Gilgus said. "It's not perfect, but the college does provide the program."

Gilgus said student teaching is vital to the future she will pay for.

"I think it's definitely a hard process, but it's also a test to see if you are ready to teach," Gilgus said. "It's more like paying to work at a job, but it's great experience."

Headlines from the nation's universities

Web site notifies drivers of "speed traps"

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — A Web site could help you avoid spending that last $130 in your bank account on a speeding ticket. Speedtrap.org is dedicated to notifying drivers where speed traps are located.

The Web site allows users to post the locations of speed traps, the level and time of enforcement as well as an analysis of each trap.

The mission of the National Motorist Association, which maintains the Web site, is to "protect the interests of North American motorists."

One of the speed traps listed is on Main Street near Pioneer High School — exactly where University of Michigan junior Mike Hilton got a speeding ticket last week.

"He wrote me a ticket for 10 over," Hilton said. His ticket will cost him $130.

Sgt. Andrew Zazula of the Ann Arbor Police department said the term "speed trap" gives the wrong connotation. He said the city has well-posted speed limits.

"If they're not paying attention to what they're doing, that's their problem," he said.

Zazula said the traps usually are created in response to an influx of excessive speed and a high accident rate in an area.

The site also gives advice on how to fight speeding tickets, such as beginning the challenge as soon as possible, pleading not guilty and hiring an attorney.

Police benefit from the site because it causes motorists to slow down in those areas, Zazula said.

Michigan law stipulates that direct fines from traffic violations "be exclusively applied to support of public libraries." The law is intended to prevent police from gaining revenue by the issue of traffic tickets.

MORE YOUNG PEOPLE, STUDENTS, MEN GETTING PLASTIC SURGERY

COLUMBUS, Ohio — "Dr. 90210," "The Swan" and MTV's "I Want a Famous Face" are just a few reality shows that revolve around America's obsession with plastic surgery.

According to 2004 statistics from the American Society for Aesthetic Plastic Surgery, men had 1.2 million cosmetic procedures and patients between the ages of 19 and 34 constituted 22 percent of all cosmetic procedures.

Michael Dunn, senior in German and linguistics at Ohio State University, had his first procedure, an otoplasty, at age 20. An otoplasty is an outer-ear surgery designed to move pronounced ears closer to the head. Now 28 and the veteran of three surgeries, otoplasty, rhinoplasty, and surgical hair transplants, Dunn said he is happy with what he sees in the mirror.

"I was totally self-conscious. I had been for a long time," he said. "I wanted to get all this stuff out of the way while I was young, before I have kids and life gets in the way. All together, it probably cost close to $20,000. I charged it."

Dr. Bahman Guyuron, a professor and chief of plastic surgery at University Hospitals of Cleveland and Case Western Reserve University, emphasized the importance of carefully selecting a surgeon.

"The number one criterion for selection of the surgeon is proper training. Equally important criterion for selection of a suitable plastic surgeon is certification by the American Board of Plastic Surgery," he said in an e-mail.

Maddy duo uses campus, community, career as platform

By Owen Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Campus, Community and Career.

These are the three Cs on which Lucas and Katie Maddy are campaigning.

The brother and sister filed to run for student body president and vice president, respectively, Monday.

Lucas, senior in agricultural technology management, said the first C, campus, will involve using Wildcat Information Network to incorporate the Kansas State Collegian, making online teacher and landlord/location evaluations available to students, and creating a weekly radio address.

"An hour of accountability," Lucas said, describing the potential address.

For the second C, community, the two said they would like for the student body president to have a permanent, non-voting seat on the Manhattan City Commission.

"It will give them an ear to the voice of the Wildcats, and it will allow us to hear what they say in regard to where money in being appropriated in the city, what changes are coming through," Katie, junior in animal science and business, said.

Lucas said Manhattan's downtown redevelopment and the return of Big Red One to Fort Riley will be key issues to Manhattan.

"K-State has always been a big fish in a small pond of Manhattan," Lucas said.

"But after the economic development and the return of Big Red One, there's going to be a lot more water and the pond is going to be a lot bigger."

The final C, career, will involve an alumni mentor program.

"We already have a Wildcat works program with 150 alumni where students can look when they need advice or are looking for internships," Katie said.

"We need to beef up this program and make it more known, so students have the chance to easily access alumni."

The two said each has vast campus and community leadership experience in 4-H Club, the Rodeo Club, the College of Agriculture Council and volunteering at local animal shelters, just to name a few.

"There's no lack of experience," Lucas said. "We've been very involved with Michael Burns and Grant Groene over the last year, and we think we've gained a lot of experience."

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Lucas Maddy, senior in agricultural technology management, and his sister, Katie Maddy, junior in animal science and business, announce their candidacy for student body president and vice president. The two will address what they call the three C's: campus, community and career.

Student gets jump on college after early high school graduation

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kara Taylor jumped from high school to college earlier than most graduating seniors.

Taylor, freshman in sociology, graduated from Manhattan High School in December and began college classes at K-State in January.

Taylor said she took upper-level classes and received all the credits she needed to graduate. To clench the decision, Taylor said her family made the choice to move to Lost Springs, Kan., which encouraged her to finish high school and stay in Manhattan for college.

"I knew I wanted to graduate early," she said. "My family decided to move, and I didn't want to move with them."

With only a few weeks to prepare for college, Taylor said the atmosphere is different from high school, but the transition to college classes has not given her trouble.

"They're not too bad," Taylor said. "I don't do too much more studying than I did in high school."

Being younger than other students is sometimes frustrating, Taylor said, especially when looking for housing.

"It sucks that I'm only 17 because I can't find a lease," Taylor said.

Although she is now a full-time college student, Taylor said she still talks to many of her friends from high school.

"I miss the social aspect, but not the classes or the drama," Taylor said.

Taylor said several students graduated from her high school in December, but she and one other girl were the only students who started the next semester in college classes. Taylor said she is the only one from her classmates who is studying at college full-time.

"I didn't want a break because it's harder to go back," she said.

One of Taylor's roommates, Katie Stegman, sophomore in elementary education, said she thought Taylor had made a quick transition into college life.

"I think she's doing good," Stegman said. "I haven't heard her complaining about classes."

Because of Taylor's ties to the area, Stegman said she thought Taylor felt more comfortable than others in her position.

"I think she's adjusting well," Stegman said. "Being from Manhattan has seemed to help out because she already knows the area."

Ryan Dubas, graduate student in English and Taylor's expository writing instructor, said Taylor is active in the classroom and group discussions.

"She offers comments frequently," Dubas said. "I guess she hasn't caught that college apathy yet."

TO THE POINT What we want to see on our candy hearts

If I were to create my own Valentines conversation heart, it would say:

Loni Woolery, edge editor: I want to have your babies.

Leann Sulzen, editor in chief: Get naked.

Matthew Girard, news editor: Whip me.

Michael Ashford, managing editor: Show me yours.

Adrienne DeWeese, city/gov editor: Oh yeah, baby.

Alex Peak, campus editor: Give it to me, baby.

Cj Lehr, managing editor: Maybe later.

Emily Lawrence, presentation editor: Feed me.

Corbin H. Crable, copy chief: The money's on the dresser.

Angie Hanson, sports editor: Rob a jewelry store and make me a grill.

Curtis Johnson, online editor: Rub a dub dub, thanks for the love.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Retaining the spirit Adults should celebrate holidays after childhood

Growing up was the dumbest thing I ever did.

Except for a handful of perks — learning to drive, staying up late, getting to remain in the pool during adult swim — what's so great about being a grownup?

Nothing drives home the point of the suckiness of the real world like the realization that a day that was once fun and exciting — Valentine's Day — has turned into an ordinary, uneventful Tuesday.

In childhood, Valentine's Day meant candy, construction-paper hearts and classroom parties with red-frosted cupcakes. It was a right we children earned by suffering through the seven dreary weeks since Christmas, and it was just enough festivity to get us through the month until spring break.

Compare that to today. Instead of carefully constructing a tinfoil-and-glitter shoebox to hold all my valentines, I'm doing what I do every Tuesday — going to work and going to class. If it weren't for eating an obligatory conversation heart or two, I might not even realize today is a holiday.

Valentine's Day isn't the only holiday that gets worse every year. Halloween used to be the king of all holidays. Weeks and weeks of preparation went into choosing and creating a costume and determining the neighborhood route that would best maximize trick-or-treating loot.

Now, in the real world, Halloween is an afterthought. Except for a few Halloween faithful, most don't even bother dressing up. And, if there happens to be a costume party, the sugar buzz of childhood is replaced by the beer buzz of college life.

Linus would be so disappointed.

Christmas might be the biggest tragedy of all. For many of us, the entire month of December was one big holiday. There were wish lists to make, trees to trim, cookies to bake and carols to sing. The song didn't lie — it really was the most wonderful time of the year.

Last year, instead of spending the whole month fa-la-lah-ing, I spent December worrying over which relatives I had to buy gifts for, what to buy them, and how I would be able to afford it.

Stress and worry replaced jolly and merriment.

Some of these changes were inevitable. We can't expect the university to cancel class today so we can eat cupcakes and make valentines out of doilies and construction paper. Likewise, getting older and having to budget for holiday gifts is a fact of life.

That doesn't mean we have to forsake these holidays, it just means we have to work harder to make them special.

So, give it a try — when October rolls around, put some thought into a costume. Wear it to class, work, Aggieville, wherever. Relearn the words to those old Christmas carols, and leave some cookies and milk out for Santa Claus again.

And as for today? There's still time. Buy silly valentines for friends, or, if you're feeling crazy, bust out the glitter and glue. Do something festive that'll make today more special for someone you love.

In my personal attempt to pay homage to St. Valentine, I bought some chalky-yet-delicious conversation hearts to share with friends. To my horror, the "be mine" and "true love" messages of my youth had been replaced by "fax me," "www.love.com" and other stupid phrases. It made me feel sad and old.

I hope you'll have better luck recapturing the holiday spirit than I did.

Westboro Baptist's protests make little sense

Once upon a time, in a land far, far away, a person could actually figure out what Fred Phelps and his family were protesting.

And though it didn't make sense, and the signs were hateful and disgusting, where the family stood was clear.

Not anymore, I'm afraid. Now the family has branched out and is protesting funerals of anyone and everyone they can get near.

From the miners in Sago, W.Va., to casualties of the war in Iraq, Phelps and his family are there to assure that the mourners are informed that their bereavement isn't nearly enough, and their loved ones are doomed to eternal pain.

Now, not only does God hate homosexuals, but he also hates America.

And by association, God is punishing soldiers who die fighting for the United States.

This includes their families, neighbors and everyone who doesn't attend Phelps' Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka.

Maybe a few of Phelps's family members too, but probably not the ones Phelps is directly related to.

LOLA

Convoluted logic is my forte. I've certainly experienced it enough in my life, and I've listened to presidents, prime ministers and a few senators speak, so I thought I had a grip on it.

But Phelps is something else.

"God hates America," Phelps said in an interview with KAKE TV in Wichita.

"This country is hell bound. It's hopeless," Phelps told a reporter from that TV station.

He believes the Bible says that homosexual sex should be criminalized and punished by the death penalty.

They even picketed the funeral of Coretta Scott King, because, according to a flyer from Westboro Baptist Church, she is a "fag enabler."

People should protest Westboro Baptist Church for being idiot enablers and inhumane, hate-mongering, homophobic, stereotypical asses.

Instead of making the state of Kansas look backward, which the Kansas School Board does quite capably, they could, oh, I don't know, preach tolerance.

I realize this is too much to ask of a group that carries signs boasting "AIDS Kills Fags Dead," but I can dream.

The protests have become so highly erratic that it leads me to think they stopped saying what they believed long ago and now are just in it for the press. At some point, people must have looked away from the debacle of their protests and the protesters panicked.

Just like a child who starts spouting off whatever comes to mind to draw attention, or a fading teen heartthrob who discovers they weren't on the front page of Tiger Beat this month, Fred Phelps' clan has begun espousing their message of hate louder and more vociferously, with all the subtlety of Quantrill's torching of Lawrence.

So they're protesting everything and anything they can think of. Going places and doing things in the name of a righteous God — only Phelps and his followers fully understand.

The question remains, why? They don't appear to be trying to actively save anyone from their inevitable doom. Phelps himself says only a certain few people are going to heaven, and the rest are destined to hell.

So what's the point? Are they acting as some sort of Cassandra, and warning everyone of their impending doom? Or are they so addicted to the spotlight and the glare of the cameras that they crave it like meth?

Spring Break workshop emphasizes nutrition, regular exercise

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students arriving Monday at the Peters Recreation Complex were in for an intensive workout.

"The Rec hosted its first 'Spring Break Body' workshop at 7 p.m. in the multipurpose room. The workshop was designed to give students ideas on how to get in shape for Spring Break, and was led by 10 personal trainers employed by Recreation Services, and was attended by approximately 40 students.

"This is the first year we have held the workshop," said Jamie Britian, senior in nutritional and exercise science, and a personal trainer. "It will be a great way to burn calories and learn good nutrition."

The workshop began with readings of the top 10 myths of fitness, called "10 Myths in 10 Minutes." One of the myths this list included was that while many people believe sit-ups will reduce abdominal fat, one actually needs to also do cardiovascular exercises to burn calories.

The list also stated that wearing heavy clothing while working out will not result in long-term weight loss. In reality, the list said, it can be dangerous because the weight makes it harder for the body to breathe. The weight initially lost is only water weight and will be gained back as soon as more liquid is consumed.

Following the myths was a list of exercise tips. The trainers read off a list of helpful ideas such as using variety in a workout to eliminate boredom. Also, the trainers said it is important to stretch at the end of workouts, to increase flexibility and to lessen soreness felt the next day.

A mini-boot camp was then set up, and the participants were split into groups of four and divided into stations. The objective was to perform the assigned station task in two minutes, and then move on to the next, with a 30-second break in between.

There were a total of 10 stations that included exercises working with BOSU balls, lateral lifts, abdominal workouts with medicine balls, and lunges. As time went on, those exercising moved slower but still kept a smile.

"I'm exhausted, but I'm really glad I came," Ashton Wright, sophomore in marketing, said. "I'm glad I brought a friend to motivate me. I'm also really excited, because it made me work and push myself."

The mini-boot camp was described as a good way to burn calories quickly, and targeted all major muscle groups.

The last section of the workshop were a few pointers on nutrition, such as getting variety and balance in a diet, and taking the numbers on food labels into account.

"I led the workshop today because my boss, Amber Long, was out of town," Kelsey Lundy, senior in food and nu-organized. It will probably be an annual thing because people seemed really interested and asked questions. I also think all the trainers had fun with it."

Club wrestling picks up a win against Northwest Missouri State

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State club wrestling team defeated Northwest Missouri State 37-12 in a dual Feb. 11 at Peters Recreation Complex.

Senior Ryan Parsons led the Wildcats with a first-period pin of NWMSU's Aaron Gudde.

K-State's Joey Martinez also won by fall, defeating C.K. Smith at 197 pounds.

K-State's Lucas Weller won a 10-2 major decision against Wes Starlin, and Sean Cillessen edged NWMSU's Chris Schwartz 2-0. Grant Reichert, Steve Kern and Emmett Smith won by forfeit to round out the scoring for K-State.

Parsons said he was pleased with the team's performance, but said he felt there was still room for improvement.

"I thought we wrestled pretty good," Parsons said. "I don't think the hometown fans got to see quite what we're capable of."

Parsons said he wished the Wildcats could have wrestled a few more matches.

Kansas pulled out of the dual at the last minute, and NWMSU had only six wrestlers competing.

K-State dominated the matches that did take place, winning 4-of-5. K-State's only loss was in the heavy-weight class, where NWMSU's

"I was real impressed with K-State's technique," he said. "Beau Tillman has a great program."

K-State coach Beau Tillman said he was pleased to pick up a victory against one of the top teams in the conference.

"(NWMSU) is probably one of the top four teams in the Southwest

Northwest Missouri State's Wes Starlin gets entangled with K-State's Ryan Parsons as they wrestle in an exhibition match after Saturday's wrestling dual.

Conference," Tillman said.

K-State and NWMSU will join 17 other club teams in Fort Worth, Texas, for the Southwest Conference tournament Feb. 19. The Wildcats will look to defend their 2005 conference championship.

Tillman said his team needs to improve before the conference tournament, but said he thinks the Wildcats are poised for a postseason run.

"We're in better shape than anyone in the NCWA (National Collegiate Wrestling Association)," Tillman said. "Our only downfall is mat time. We'll be going against guys who have wrestled 40 matches, and some of our guys have only wrestled 10."

Tillman said injuries also were a concern. Cillessen suffered a knee injury in an exhibition match against NWMSU's Gudde, but Tillman said he expects Cillessen to wrestle at the conference tournament.

"In college, it's a war," Tillman said. "Every week you get dings and scratches and poked eyes. It's just a question of whether you're mentally tough enough to keep going."

OLY | Kildow crashes, goes to hospital

SAN SICARIO, Italy — American downhill skier Lindsey Kildow somehow escaped serious injury in a frightening free-fall crash on her downhill training run Monday, moments after defending Olympic champion Carole Montillet-Carles of France was hurt in a spectacular fall. Kildow, a medal contender, was taken by helicopter to a hospital trauma center in Torino, the Games' host city about 50 miles down the Alps.

The 21-year-old Kildow lost control when her left ski slid out as she began to turn right around a gate on a rolling, relatively flat stretch midway through the run. She immediately went into an awkward split, with her right knee buckling and slamming against the ground.

Her momentum carried her into the air for about 15 feet and she landed on her back, slammed her head and slid to a stop. Kildow was heaving with pain as medical personnel rushed to her aid.

His victory in the men's 500 meters — a furious sprint — gave the United States its second speedskating gold medal of the Torino Games, adding to the one Chad Hedrick won in the 5,000 meters Saturday.

Snowboarders Hannah Teter won gold and Gretchen Bleiler won silver — another set of Olympic medals for the United States on the halfpipe on Monday, as well.

The top-two women in a distinctly American sport, Teter and Bleiler dominated every part of the snowboarding event Monday from qualifying through finals. They gave the United States four of the possible six medals throughout two days of competition in sunny Bardonecchia.

A day earlier, it was Shaun White and Danny Kass won gold and silver respectively, with Mason Aguirre in fourth.

Wooldridge hopes to return on Wednesday

By Doug Tucker
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Jim Wooldridge is having difficulty talking — not surprising since surgeons had to work their way through his throat in order to get to a bulging disc in his neck.

But he still hopes to accompany Kansas State to Texas Tech for his team's game with the Red Raiders on Wednesday.

"I'm really trying," he said Monday during the Big 12 Conference weekly coaches' call. "I'm going to play it day by day. I'm not going to do anything today, but hopefully I'll feel a little better tomorrow."

Wooldridge's Wildcats are 1-1 without him after their 74-71 loss on Sunday at Missouri, who snapped a seven-game losing streak in what was dubbed "the interim bowl" because the Tigers were coached by interim Melvin Watkins and Jimmy Elgas, Wooldridge's top assistant, handled duties for the Wildcats.

Watching the closely fought game at home was Wooldridge. No, he did not stay calm like any good doctor would advise a patient just a few days out of surgery.

"I didn't feel good, but I ended up watching the whole second half," said Wooldridge. "It's almost impossible, because you're pulling so hard for your guys and you want them to do well. Not having a hand in it, it's an impossible situation to stay somewhat calm."

The Wildcats have lost three out of four. Their lone win in that stretch was a 66-63 on Wednesday, the day Wooldridge had his surgery to repair a bulging disc which had caused numbness in his hand to start moving down his arm and legs.

Coach's resignation long overdue

Oklahoma State's legendary basketball coach, Eddie Sutton, is done for the season after asking the university for a leave of absence Monday.

MATTHEW GIRARD

Of course, as the university reported, Sutton's request is totally unrelated to the fact that the 70-year-old coach was involved in a vehicle accident Friday and was cited for driving under the influence.

Sutton told reporters that his decision to take a leave was because of his health.

"With my deteriorating physical condition and other issues, I have been under a tremendous amount of stress ... After Friday's events, I know it is best to go on medical leave the remainder of the season to address my future health," Sutton said.

Now before you go and get in a tizzy about how Sutton should be fired, this very second for pulling a Larry Eustachy or a Bob Huggins, the Cowboys coach of 16 years already is on his way out.

In May 2004, Sutton named his son Sean as his successor, which paved the way for the elder Sutton to step down, either when he felt like he couldn't coach anymore or if a crazy scandal came out.

Honestly, Eddie has been more like the Queen of England as of late — purely a ceremonial head of Oklahoma State basketball.

If you watched the K-State/Oklahoma State game Feb. 4, you know what I mean. If you didn't catch the game, the elder Sutton spent most of the Cowboys' 63-61 win sitting in his chair and flashing his trademark scowl.

Sean was the one stomping up and down the sidelines, barking out orders and holding the clipboard during timeouts. Eddie occasionally got up to stretch his legs or give a stern look to an official, but it seemed he would much rather be in his office in Stillwater, Okla., kicking back with a highball — which coincidentally might have got him in trouble Friday.

Witnesses told police that Sutton was unsteady on his feet and struck his head after falling in the parking lot of Gallagher-Iba Arena just before his accident.

I'm not condoning Sutton's decision to drive while intoxicated, but if you were a legendary college basketball coach with not a whole lot to do and your team has won only three Big 12 Conference games, hanging out in my office and having a drink while I'm remembering the good 'ole days doesn't sound all that bad.

I would much rather see Coach Sutton make his grand exit on a more positive note, but he's already got the court named after him.

Sutton should quit delaying the inevitable and just announce his "official" retirement instead of taking a leave.

Feeling tied

Sado-masochism presents the other side of sex

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ever wanted to see someone set their significant other on fire? Attend a fetish ball and you might get your chance. The Karma Fetish Ball last Friday at Davey's Up-town in Kansas City, Mo., catered to adherents of bondage and sado-masochism, abbreviated by its adherents to BDSM.

The ball brought in vendors, fetish performers and a large number of spectators to the Main Street bar.

For some, the Ball was a fun evening out. But for others, BDSM is not an evening activity. It is a part of life.

Standing in front of a booth with paddles, shockers and various other implements stands a vendor. Identifying herself only as Ms. Toy, she has been involved in BDSM for 22 years.

"BDSM is very much about sensation ... it's playing with pain, it's playing with fear and terror," she said.

The initiation for Toy came after a fight with her boyfriend, who came home one day with whip marks on his back. After they split ways, Toy met her former boyfriend's master, who trained her in the methods of BDSM.

Participants in BDSM are divided into two distinct categories, Toy said.

"The tops, the bottoms – the doers, the doees – the masters, the slaves – the dominants, the submissives," Toy said.

Originally trained as a top, Toy said she became bored, and met a man for whom she spent time as a collared slave. But, she encountered a problem, a lack of quality materials to work with.

To overcome this difficulty, she used a little innovation – which gave rise to a new name and, eventually, a business.

"I developed the theory that everything is a toy," she said.

For those curious about BDSM, Toy said the Internet is a gold mine of information, and will often have listings for online and local groups.

On the other side of the establishment, Master Ras draws a wet towel across the back of his girlfriend and slave, Lovely. After the towel, he applies a solution to her skin, touches a torch to her bare back and sets her ablaze.

The technique is known as FirePlay, and is another of the broad range of techniques that fall under BDSM.

Ras said he has been in the BDSM lifestyle for about a year and a half, and that he learned FirePlay from another master.

"In the community you find people who know things, some are willing to teach you, some are not," Ras said.

Although the procedure has some inherent risks, like all responsible tops, Ras takes precautions for both him and Lovely, and both walk off the stage unhurt.

Lovely said BDSM plays into their relationship, but it is not the only aspect of it.

"Submission and surrender, there's a lot of trust involved," she said.

But not everyone who attended the event was a performer or vendor. Some just enjoyed the environment.

Victoria Yiang contentedly walked around and talked with people whom she also, occasionally, flogged.

The flogger she carried with her worked mostly as an icebreaker, she said.

"For me, it's just a conversation piece," Yiang said. "I can go to a bar and flog, like, five or six people a night. It's all fun."

For many practitioners, the misconception that BDSM is simply about pain or degradation is one they are quick to dispel.

In fact, Montega Albert, owner of Backlash Entertainment, the company that sponsored the event, said at the core of BDSM is respect.

"You have to understand what the person you are dealing with can handle," she said. "I have to respect that, if that's too hard, I stop."

The importance of respect was underscored by Mistress Bellasera, who differentiated between "safe-players," who use well-known and accepted methods and "unsafe-players," who deviate into dangerous practices.

To keep things on an even keel, many BDSM dungeons will not allow either tops or bottoms under the influence of drugs or alcohol.

In addition to the unwritten rules of BDSM, Charles Goodwin said a public setting can help keep things safe, and provide a more secure atmosphere for people who are just starting.

Goodwin was also present at the event as a vendor selling handmade leather floggers, and joined in an impromptu performance.

Holding a static electricity generator, Goodwin sent an electrical current through his body, while others touched metal objects to his skin, creating arcs of electricity – yet another facet of BDSM called ElectricPlay.

The generator is known as the Violet Wand, and can be adjusted from a mild sensation – similar to a rubber band snap – to a current powerful enough to permanently brand skin.

But, through it all, Goodwin also reiterated the importance of respect and being aware of others' boundaries.

"If you don't want something to happen then it's not going to happen," he said. "If somebody's trying to press themselves on you, there's going to be someone around that's going to be able to stop it."

This is the sentiment established by Joseph Bean, who Toy called the father of the modern BDSM movement. "Safe. Sane. Consensual."

It is this mantra that practitioners keep in mind to ensure everyone goes home at the end of the night.

But, where do they go home to? Toy said myths of BDSM, again, fall far short of the fact.

"People that are into BDSM are very much your neighbors. It's not about people on the other side of town," Toy said. "They go to your churches, they're part of your social groups. Just like any other alternate lifestyle, you have an array."

Toy also stressed the need to look further than the surface to find the true draw of BDSM.

"It's not just about kinky sex. It's about exploring some different feelings, some different needs," she said. "It's about stepping outside of the box."

VALENTINES RECIPES

Baking with loved ones can sweeten holiday

While some people may go out on an extravagant night on the town, this recipe is for those looking for a little more hands on experience on Valentine's Day – at least in the kitchen.

This is perhaps my favorite recipe of all time: Aunt Annie Marshall's buttermilk cookie recipe. And while it's probably a cardinal sin to reveal its contents, I figured since I loved it so much, others might too.

So consider baking this cookie perfection with your significant other on Valentine's. And if you're a single guy or gal like me, bake this recipe for your friends or even yourself, like I plan to today.

In this easy-to-make cookie recipe, I have also added a frosting recipe. Let your imagination go wild as you and your loved ones cut out your favorite cookie shapes, frost and sprinkle them.

You don't have to be a cooking expert to master this recipe. Never underestimate the amount of fun you can have in the kitchen.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Aunt Annie Marshall's Sugar Cookies

Preparation: 30 minutes
Ready in: 1 hour 30 minutes

Ingredients

6 cup flour
2 cup sugar
1 cup buttermilk
1 cup shortening
2 tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. baking soda

Cooking instructions

Preheat oven to 400 degrees F. Lightly grease cookie sheets. In a very large bowl, cream shortening, sugar and eggs. Add flour, baking powder and salt. (I recommend doing this gradually, adding a flour in small increments and mixing. It's much easier to blend.)

In a separate bowl, blend buttermilk, vanilla and baking soda. The mix will get slightly foamy. Add buttermilk mixture to contents in larger bowl. Mix together and form into a slightly firm dough.

Lightly flour a large, flat surface. Grab some of the dough and roll it out until 1/4 to 1/3 inch thick. Flour the ends of your cookie cutter. (This will prevent your cutter from sticking to the dough). And cut out your favorite shapes with cookie cutter.

Place cookies about two inches apart on cookie sheet. Bake 9-10 minutes. Cool on wire rack.

Frosting

Preparation: 15 minutes
Ready in: 15 minutes

Ingredients

4 cups confectioners' sugar
1/2 cup shortening
5 tablespoons milk
1 teaspoon vanilla extract
Food coloring (optional)

Directions

In a large bowl, cream together the confectioners' sugar and shortening until smooth.

Gradually blend in the milk and vanilla with a mixer until smooth and stiff, which takes about 5 minutes. Color with food coloring, if desired.

Make it a date

■ Plan a date night with your partner or friends. You can cook dinner together and watch a movie. Integrate a little kitchen fun with this recipe.

■ For those on a creative spree, consider prying away from typical heart cookie cutter shapes. Cut out your own shapes of things you like or things that represent the one you love.

■ Get frosting-friendly. You have the power to take the frosting beyond the kitchen. Just have fun.

Single students still plan to enjoy Valentine's Day

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Valentine's Day is the peak sales day for companies like Russell Stovers and Hallmark, according to www.historychannel.com. Stores are plastered with red and pink hearts, flowers and stuffed animals.

With everything geared toward couples today, what options do single people have to celebrate the holiday?

The residents of West Hall created a bulletin board, "Valentine's Day, Schmalintine's Day," as a way to celebrate Valentine's Day without a significant other.

"I created the board for the girls to share how they can give love to others when they don't have a significant other for Valentine's Day," said Erin Jones, junior in family studies and human services and resident assistant of the third floor of West.

Every pink heart on the board has a suggestion from a resident of what to do on this lovers' holiday.

One of the suggestions was to have a 'chick flick night' where a group of women sit in their room and female-oriented movies.

"For Valentine's Day, I'm going to go out with other singles and try not to think about the other couples while I'm out," Allen Barnes, freshman in open-option, said.

According to www.chiff.com, a suggestion on Valentine's Day for singles is celebrating by planning an activity that is meaningful and enjoyable to you.

The first bit of advice is to choose something that provides you with a special treat such as going to a day spa for "the works."

"I think one of the most popular services people get done here is the spa pedicure with lavender exfoliant and a mint masque," said Wida Egan, floor supervisor for Crums Beauty

College. "We massage the feet and leg up to the knee. Also the back facial, which is a 20 minute massage."

Another advice tip is to have an anti-Valentine's Day party, where you invite single friends over and have fun by playing board games, Monopoly, Twister or blast some booty bumping music and have a dance.

"For Valentine's Day, I am hanging out with my Bible study girls and then going to the West Hall Valentine's dance in the basement," Jones said.

Another option the Web site offers is to design a relationship-building plan by letting the holiday provide you with motivation to think of new ways to find and create a lasting intimate relationship.

"Valentine's Day is targeted toward those who have a significant other, everyone wants to receive love on this day, and you don't have to have a significant other to have fun on this Day," Jones said.

Valentines by the numbers

192 192 million Valentine's Day cards are exchanged annually, making Valentine's Day the second-most popular greeting-card-giving occasion. (This total excludes packaged kids valentines for classroom exchanges.) (Source: Hallmark research)

60 Nearly 60 percent of all Valentine's Day cards are purchased in the six days prior to the observance, making Valentine's Day a procrastinator's delight. (Source: Hallmark research)

13.5 The total value of shipments in 2003 for firms producing chocolate and cocoa products was $13.5 billion. Non-chocolate confectionery product manufacturing, meanwhile, was a $5.5 billion industry.

3,523 There were 3,523 confectionery and nut stores in the United States in 2003. Often referred to as candy stores, they are among the best sources of sweets for Valentine's Day.

4.7 The per capita consumption of candy by Americans in 2004 was 4.7 pounds. Candy consumption has actually declined over the last few years; in 1997, each American gobbled or savored more than 27 pounds of candy a year.

Center makes crafts mobile

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Arts Center, 1520 Poyntz Ave., brings art to the community in the form of a colorful van full of crafts.

Elisabeth Hillstock, administrative assistant and box office manager at the center, said they call the vehicle the MAC truck.

"It's painted all over," Hillstock said. "It's a huge truck." The MAC truck is filled with art supplies for an assortment of activities.

"It has a whole lot of arts and crafts material in it," she said. "Face paints to markers to popsicle sticks."

Letting people know the vehicle is available for use can be difficult, Hillstock said, even though it is available for public reservation.

"A lot of people don't even know that we have that," she said. "We have an intern trying to put the word out, but because there are only three of us in the office, we really don't have time to advertise."

Hillstock said the van full of crafts is a good option for kids and birthday parties.

For more information on the MAC truck, contact Manhattan Arts Center at (785) 537-4420

"I think it's a great idea," Hillstock said. "I don't know any kid who doesn't want their face painted. It's not used as much as it could or should be."

Penny Senften, director of the center, said Briggs Auto Group gave the vehicle to the center in 2001 to be used as a mobile art unit in Manhattan.

"We put the art supplies into the truck and take it out to the community," Senften said.

A small fee is charged for using the vehicle, Senften said, but the center tries to keep it affordable for people in the community to use. For reservations, Senften said the center needs about two weeks notice before providing the vehicle.

Although the MAC truck is still relatively new to the public, Senften said kids who see it at events will often surround the vehicle, knowing it is filled with fun.

"There were always kids flocking around it," Senften said.

Melissa Galitzer, volunteer at the center, said she has been helping with face painting with the MAC truck for a few years.

While the vehicle is parked in front of the center, Galitzer said people still are unaware of its purpose.

"A lot of people don't know it's available," Galitzer said. "It sits in the parking lot of the MAC, and some of my friends have asked about it."

Galitzer said she has fun helping with events with the MAC truck, and the kids always appreciate having her.

"They're always very happy," she said. "There are always a lot of smiles in the mirror on the van."

Cold weather brings crows, threat of disease from the north

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While walking to Ackert and Chalmers halls for class, students and faculty members alike have become aware of a large crow population congregating near the buildings.

"It smells really bad, and it can't be too healthy," Derek Nease, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management, said.

"The sidewalks are always white -- and they stink."

Crows are winter visitors, which means they arrive in the fall and will move north to breeding grounds in April or May, Brett Sandercock, assistant professor of biology, said.

Though crows are a long-lived bird, their biggest threat is posed by great horned owls. Crows seek refuge in areas that are predator-free and roosting locations vary from year to year.

"The last couple of years they've taken to roosting in the cedars on campus," Sandercock said. "There are fewer owls and a more open environment."

While the crows do not pose a major health threat to students and other passersby, crows are the species of bird most likely to carry West Nile Virus, he said.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, this virus is a potentially serious illness that is contracted most often from mosquito bites.

West Nile is spread to other species when a mosquito bites an infected bird and carries the virus to another animal.

Humans and horses are both susceptible for infection, and humans who are elderly or who have challenged immune systems are at the greatest risk, Sandercock said.

There also are precautions that can be taken, said Jennifer Bormann, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

For example, it is recommended that horses receive a West Nile vaccination, which is effective, and steps should be taken to control the mosquito population, she said.

Furthermore, if a student finds a dead or wounded bird, they should maintain their distance and avoid contact, Sandercock said.

The Manhattan Audubon Society sponsors an annual bird census called the Manhattan Christmas Bird Counts.

According to data obtained each December, the crow populations has declined over the past couple of years, and West Nile Virus is one possible reason for this decline.

However, as large amounts of crows still seek on-campus refuge, K-State has taken steps to deter roosting birds.

"I've noticed that they're trying to move them along with non-lethal means," Judy

Roe, research associate in agronomy, said.

Tactics used to frighten the crows away include setting off fire crackers, using loud noise devices such as air horns and shining bright lights in the roosting areas, Roe said.

However, crows are clever birds, Sandercock said, and become acclimated to such disturbances very quickly.

"The crows will be gone by spring time, just like the students," he said.

Burn bans in place; dry conditions cause wildfire, farming concerns

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

National and state-wide wildfires have been a concern with the increasingly abnormal dry-winter weather.

Kansas now has 20 counties that have a burn ban in effect.

According to the CNN Web page, five people were killed in Texas and Oklahoma because of wildfires.

"There is an increasing concern of wildfires because of the weather," Walter Fick, associate professor of agronomy, said. "Gov. Kathleen Sebelius just designated southeast Kansas as a potential wildfire area."

According to the 2006 County Burn Ban Alert from the state fire marshal, Kansas has experienced dry conditions to vegetation that can be considered flammable and hazardous.

"There are concerns about brush piles and trash burning," Fick said. "The burn ban means that there cannot be any open burning period."

Riley and Wabaunsee counties have a burn permit system, in which the residents of these counties have to call before they burn to make sure it's OK, Fick said.

"When it gets really dry outside, sparks start to fly, and things can burn easily," Fick said.

There are simple things students can do to prevent wildfires, such as not driving down the highway and throwing cigarettes out of the window, Fick said.

"The problem is, if you don't have enough moisture for your crops, they don't grow well," said Pat Collins, Riley County emergency director and fire chief. "Farmers like to burn grass to promote new growth in crops and to help with cattle. If they can't burn, it affects the production of cattle."

The fire department can control the risk of wildfires for now, because they can tell people whether or not they can burn, which helps because when the weather conditions are at risk for wildfires people are not permitted to burn, Fick said.

"We can control wildfires by prescribing burning for burning permits," Collins said.

"For the last three days there has been a stop to burning, I don't think I'm going to request a burn ban until the state issues one."

"My concern is that we are still in that part of winter when the wind changes directions, if it is dry enough we can have fires that go into the night."

Low humidity and high winds are a tender box for wildfires, Collins said.

"If it gets too dry, then fires can get away destroying life and property," he said.

Speaker challenges students to be active

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To highlight National Mortar Board week, Mary Hale Tolar, director of the Kansas Center for Rural Initiative, gave a presentation Thursday evening.

Tolar is a graduate of K-State as well as a Mortar Board alumna. Mortar Board is a national college leadership honor society focusing on scholarship, leadership and service.

Tolar delivered her speech, "Educating Citizens, Building Communities," in the K-State Student Union's Forum Hall to students, faculty, and alumni of Mortar Board.

She spoke about her views of higher education and civic responsibility.

"A college career is about learning and growing," Tolar said. "It's about your response to hard questions. You may or may not be aware that the curriculum is designed intentionally to help you through that process."

The hard questions Tolar spoke of were questions concerning choices, including what kind of contribution students want to make to the world.

"Is what you say is important to you demonstrated by what you do?" Tolar asked. "It's a tall order to take stock of yourself at this one moment in time, who you are right now, what you care about, and how you've invested your time, energy and talents."

Tolar challenged students to take active personal participation in their college education.

"Be intentional about your learning and your personal growth," she said. "Take time to reflect and make connections between the subjects you're learning in the classes or the laboratory, and the work you're doing onstage, or at the paper, and the service you provide to your sorority, or church, or community service club."

Tolar encouraged students to motivate themselves to exercise leadership.

"It's not enough to say, 'I'll call upon, I will serve - I will lead,'" she said. "It is expected that there is someone out there more capable than you, but you are the best person for the job. Don't wait for the call."

In addition to Tolar's speech, five campus organizations were recognized for their role at K-State. Student representatives from each group were recognized at the beginning of the evening. Featured groups included the Little Apple chapter of the National Residence Hall Honorary, Chimes Junior Honorary, Alpha Epsilon Delta, Blue Key Honor Society, the Multicultural Business Student Association and the Multicultural National Honor Society.

Kelly Olson, senior in mass communications, said Tolar's message was good for students looking to apply for membership in various honor groups.

"I think sometimes I get nervous to apply for different things, and (Tolar) just gave me confidence to be sure of myself," she said.

Ali Johnson, junior in mass communications, said she thought Tolar had an excellent

Lawmakers consider ban on some cigarettes

Lawmakers in Kansas are working on a legislation to ban the sale of flavored cigarettes with the argument that the products are targeted toward kids.

The move has been defended as a way to protect children. The law states that it is illegal to sell tobacco products to children younger than 18.

State tobacco taxes have been escalating over the years and are currently 79 cents a pack, according to a Feb. 7 news report published in the Topeka Capital-Journal.

The bill, which has received a hearing in the House Judiciary Committee, has yet to be debated.

The news report also stated that the Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control conducts controlled buys of cigarettes every year. The compliance rate of clerks who refuse to sell cigarettes to minors was 62 percent in 2004, one of the lowest in the nation.

Julie Stutheit, owner of On the Wildside, 1228 Moro St., said the store has different brands of flavored cigarettes and sells about six packs a day.

"We have brands like Sweet Dreams, Nat Sherman and Djarum," Stutheit said. "And about eight different flavors, including cherry, vanilla, chocolate, mint and cloves. These are mostly demanded by younger people."

Stutheit said the bill will not make a difference if it is passed. She said kids who smoke will get their cigarettes from their own sources. Tobacco sellers typically demand I.D. before selling tobacco products, Stutheit said.

"Most habitual smokers demand regular cigarettes," she said. "There are some people who smoke flavored cigarettes regularly, but for the most part, the people who come to buy them do so just to try them."

Tobacco Alley, 3037 Anderson Ave., offers a variety of flavored cigarettes. Men and women of all ages demand these cigarettes, said store owner Retta Watson, who sells about five packs a day.

Watson said the government's move to ban flavored cigarettes is unfair.

"The government can do anything," Watson said. "We have to comply."

Margie Christensen, employee at Good Price Cigarette in Abilene, Kan., said she does not think her sales will be significantly affected by the ban if it passes.

"Though the decision is not going to have an impact on my business, I do not support the government's decision to ban flavored cigarettes," she said.

Christensen said the store carries cherry, vanilla and chocolate flavors, but the store does not see a big demand for flavored cigarettes.

"These cigarettes are usually bought by women who are in the age group 25 and 35," she said. "People mostly buy these cigarettes for special occasions."

Program encourages online education, degrees

By Jaci Boydston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As universities move toward the integration of more online classes and learning tools, some K-State faculty members are trying to increase the university's involvement in online education through the Great Plains Interactive Distance Education Alliance.

The Great Plains IDEA is an inter-institutional program that offers master's degrees and post-baccalaureate certificates in an entirely online format. Students enroll at one of the partner universities but take courses from faculty at several institutions.

Currently, students through K-State have three degree options: personal financial planning, youth development or gerontology. The university, in the Performance Agreements it makes with the Kansas Board of Regents each year, has made a goal to increase the number of programs to 12 by the fall of 2008, and plans are under way for several new programs.

Al Keithley, professor of landscape architecture, said a fourth degree, a master's of science in community development, was approved by the Graduate School Academic Affairs Committee and will be considered by the Faculty Senate.

Virginia Moxley, founding member of the Great Plains IDEA and assistant dean of human ecology, said the program is expected to be fully approved by fall 2006.

Moxley said new programs are proposed when faculty members see a need for them in an industry.

"Our experience has been that faculty in disciplines are really good experts on where the profession is going," Moxley said.

The Great Plains IDEA uses information provided by the K-State Survey System to learn what employers and other institutions think about the particular needs of a profession or field of study. It then tries to address those needs, which can lead to programs in different fields of study or programs at different educational levels, Moxley said.

"(We ask), 'What does the nation need?'" Moxley said. "And where do we have assets that we can capture to help meet that and do it collectively?" One of the things you discover as you start looking at what the nation needs is that sometimes the need appears to be at the baccalaureate level and sometimes it's clearly at the graduate level."

To address those needs, Moxley said some programs that are currently in early development stages are considering offering undergraduate certificates.

Programs being considered include food security, grassland management, agricultural communications and agricultural mechanization, Moxley said. Also in the planning stage is a nuclear engineering program.

"The College of Engineering is working with other Big 12 universities on a nuclear engineering program," Moxley said. "Most campuses have one or two faculty members in nuclear engineering, and most of the nation's nuclear engineers are approaching retirement, so they're banding together to try to prepare for the next generation."

Of the three programs offered at K-State, the gerontology and youth development programs enrolled 16 students each for fall 2005, and the personal financial planning program had 73 students, said Debra Wood, coordinator of family studies and human services.

According to Moxley, 15 to 20 students graduate each year.

Moxley said the future of distance education alliances like the Great Plains IDEA look bright, since the institutions are focusing on achieving specific goals.

"Part of this is going to depend on the success of the programs that are now out there, but I must say that by all indications the number of higher education alliances is growing," Moxley said.

Humane Society, clinics offer rebates to spay, neuter pets

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

February is Prevent-A-Litter Month, and Riley County Humane Society is making an effort to reduce the pet population.

Courtney Smith, volunteer for Riley County Humane Society, said the humane society and area veterinarian clinics are providing a $20 rebate for spay and neuter surgeries. Rebate coupons will appear in the Manhattan Mercury and Wamego Smoke Signal on Wednesday, and they are for people who are in need of financial assistance, she said.

Smith said pet overpopulation is out of control across the country.

"We're trying to make a difference in this area and across the country," she said. "Pet overpopulation is a problem."

Spaying or neutering an animal also can reduce the animal's cancer risk, said John Lyons, veterinarian and owner of Candlewood Veterinary Clinic, 3262

Kimball Ave.

Female animals who are spayed are at a reduced risk for breast cancer, and they cannot have ovarian or uterine cancer, Lyons said. Male animals also are at less of a risk for testicular cancer if they are neutered.

Lyons said the reduced cancer risk from spaying and neutering is true with dogs, but the risk is somewhat lowered for cats.

Dogs and cats also are more likely to be hit by a car when in heat, which is prevented by spaying and neutering, Lyons said.

"It's better for you, better for your pet and better for the animal overpopulation," he said.

Lyons said the duration of spaying or neutering an animal depends on several factors, including how big the animal is, the animal's age and the technique used by the veterinarian. On average, the procedure takes an hour, Lyons said.

Research finds bestselling card, nationwide Valentine choice

By Matt Sedensky
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Turns out love may actually be a universal language.

The world's largest greeting card maker, Hallmark Cards Inc., has for the first time analyzed individual cities' data for top-selling Valentines, and it yielded a surprising result.

They were all the same — a result of the exhaustive research Hallmark carries out before any card goes on the shelf. It's a process of analyzing sales numbers and trend hunting in search of the perfect valentine.

Researchers at the Kansas City-based company expected the choices of customers to be as different as the cities they call home. But it turned out V330-5, one of the thousands of options Hallmark offered last Valentine's Day, was the top choice of consumers in New York and Los Angeles, Minneapolis and Miami, and virtually every other city in the country.

"We thought it would be a different card in every city," said spokeswoman Rachel Bolton. "It was just a surprising thing."

Jessica Ong, product manager for the company's Valentine's card line, had an idealistic suggestion for the sales numbers' meaning.

"It speaks to the fact that people are more alike than they are different," she said.

The card's face is a deep red foil, with "For the One I Love" across the top in black script, a large picture of a red rose in the center, and a thick black ribbon cutting through the middle. Inside, it simply states: "Each time I see you, hold you, think of you, here's what I do ... I fall deeply, madly, happily in love with you. Happy Valentine's Day."

The card's designer, Marcia Meulengracht, said she was not at all surprised the card sold five times better than the average Valentine — so well it's being offered for a second year.

"I cut to the chase — what I would want to give and what I would want to receive," Meulengracht said. "A guy wants to say he still loves her. A gal wants to know he still does. She wants to get goose bumps. He wants to think he'll get lucky."

It's never as simple as just artistic intuition, though. The National Retail Federation estimates 62 percent of Americans will buy valentines this year.

For every Hallmark card that lands on a store shelf, the company has scoured sales figures, conducted research and studied trends to make sure it belongs there.

"They aren't just spit out of a machine," said Paul Barker, the vice president of Hallmark's creative unit. "A lot of eyes look at it and a lot of care goes into it to make sure that we're saying the right thing and creating an artifact that consumers want to save."

The components of cards get made all sorts of ways. Sometimes an artist or writer is simply asked to create general illustrations or messages for a designated occasion, sometimes they're given a specific card assignment, sometimes they collaborate to create a winning card.

Police search for missing convict

Woman with dog rehab program allegedly becomes accomplice

By Margaret Stafford
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LANSING, Kan. — Authorities believe a woman who ran a dog rehabilitation program at Lansing Correctional Facility willingly drove out of the prison Sunday with a convicted murderer hiding in her van.

The prison said the Leavenworth County attorney issued a warrant for program operator Toby Young's arrest.

The Kansas Highway Patrol broadcast an advisory to officers that Young was considered armed and dangerous, said patrol spokesman Gary Warner.

She is believed to have driven out of the medium-security prison with John N. Manard, 27, who was serving a life sentence for a murder in Johnson County nearly 10 years ago.

He also is considered armed and dangerous.

"She is no longer a missing person," Warner said of Young. "She is a suspect."

Investigators Monday evening had "no idea" where the two were, corrections spokesman Bill Miskell said.

At a news conference, Miskell said investigators are looking into whether anyone checked the van — a normal procedure — before Young drove away from the prison. He said they don't know when Manard first got into the van.

Young was charged with aiding and abetting aggravated escape and aiding a felon.

The prison said the charges were based on information obtained during the investigation into Manard's escape, but did not provide additional details.

Miskell declined to elaborate on why investigators believe Young went willingly instead of being taken against her will.

Young, 48 and president of the Safe Harbor Prison Dog Program, was at the prison Sunday — the day Manard escaped. A white Ford cargo van used to transport dogs from animal shelters to the prison also was missing from prison grounds. The van is registered to Young, and it's possible the two are in the vehicle, Miskell said.

"There is no search area now because we don't know where they are," he said. "It's a very distinctive van, but it's been more than 24 hours. Where do you look?"

Relatives of Young in Wyandotte County refused to comment Monday.

A man who answered the phone at her family's home said they were letting all information come from prison officials and "trying to keep the phone lines open."

Young has run the prison dog program since 2004, bringing in dogs from area animal shelters to inmates for training so the animals eventually can be adopted as pets.

Manard participated in the program.

In a December 2005 Associated Press photo, Manard is seen walking a dog with a smiling Young following close behind.

"If you can harness their aggressiveness, you can save their lives," he said in an interview for a story about the program. "This is a way of life for me. It's all I got."

Miskell said Young had been coming to the prison with the dogs regularly for 18 months. The staff was "still trying to grasp what happened."

Toby Young was well-known and well-liked," he said.

He said the Safe Harbor program, as of right now, would continue because it's a very popular program.

Manard was serving a life sentence for first-degree murder, aggravated robbery and possession of firearms in the killing of Donald England.

England, 45, was sitting in his car in an Overland Park strip mall parking lot on June 13, 1996, when Manard and another teen, Michael Yardley, of Edgerton, tried to steal the vehicle.

England, a father of two, was pulled from the Chrysler convertible and shot in the chest.

Manard and Yardley, who were 17 and 18 when the murder occurred, were sentenced in 1997 to life in prison.

It was never officially determined who pulled the trigger.

Young is described as a white female, 5-foot-1 and 130 pounds, with brown hair and brown eyes.

Manard, who would have been eligible for parole in 2011, is described as white, with red or auburn hair and hazel eyes. He is about 6-foot-2 and weighs 190 pounds.

The missing van was registered in Wyandotte County and has a personalized plate SHDOGS.

The van has on it an emblem bearing the following e-mail address: <http://www.safeharbor-prisondogs.com>.

As of today, there was no news about Young on the Web site, which services customers from across the state.

Senate moves $70 billion tax bill forward

By Mary Dalrymple
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — Senators argued Monday over the Bush administration's tax cuts for investors while sending a $70 billion tax bill into final negotiations.

Although the bill makes no mention of tax cuts for capital gains and dividends, Democrats lined up motions to attack the tax reductions and Republicans rushed to defend them.

The election-year debate proved a mostly political display. The motions under debate don't bind lawmakers who will hammer out the final version of the tax bill. They can only make suggestions to negotiators.

Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, a Republican member of the Senate Finance Committee, said he hoped to be chosen as one of those negotiators. "You think I'm going to pay attention to any motions to instruct me?" he asked. "Baloney."

The bill would cut taxes $70 billion over five years, mostly extending tax breaks scheduled to expire before the end of the decade.

The centerpiece of the House bill would preserve tax cuts for capital gains and dividends for two years after their disappearance at the end of 2008. The biggest feature of the Senate bill would prevent millions of families from owing the alternative minimum tax this year.

Democrats urged negotiators to make their priority the alternative minimum tax, intended to trap wealthy tax dodgers but now encroaching on the middle class. They also said money returned to taxpayers through the capital gain and dividend tax reductions would be better spent on veterans, military equipment, health care and other needs.

"If we are honest about reducing the deficit and strengthening the economy, we need to stop lavishing tax breaks on the rich and start investing in the health and well-being of all families," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

Republicans said taxpayers will be surprised to find their taxes increasing unless Congress acts to keep all tax reductions, including those for investors, in place.

Former student body president of MidAmerica Nazarene University pleads guilty to murder

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. — A former student body president of MidAmerica Nazarene University pleaded guilty Monday to intentional second-degree murder for helping the school's former secretary kill her husband nearly 24 years ago.

Prosecutors said Mark Mangelsdorf, now 45 and living in suburban New York City, was having a romantic relationship with Melinda Raisch. They claimed Raisch and Mangelsdorf conspired to kill David Harmon because their church, the Nazarene Church, did not condone divorce.

"Obviously, I'm interested in serving the time as soon as possible so that my family and I can get on with the rest of our lives," Mangelsdorf, whose wife recently had a baby, told Kansas City television station KCTV after the sentencing.

The plea was not expected because Mangelsdorf's attorneys had indicated they planned to seek to prevent Raisch from testifying against Mangelsdorf during the court appearance.

Harmon was 25 on Feb. 28, 1982, when he was beaten to death in the home he shared with his wife in Olathe. Raisch moved to Ohio after the killing, remarried and had two children.

She was convicted in May 2005 of first-degree murder and conspiracy to commit murder for her role in the killing.

Mangelsdorf testified at Raisch's trial that he was a friend of the couple and denied any romantic relationship with the defendant.

In court Monday, Johnson County District Attorney Paul Morrison said the plot to kill Harmon was Mangelsdorf's idea and that Mangelsdorf killed Harmon with a crowbar.

Raisch and Mangelsdorf were interviewed after the killing, but authorities said they lacked the evidence to bring charges. The crack in the case came several years ago when Raisch offered investigators a different account of what happened the night of the killing.

Mangelsdorf is free on bond until his May 12 sentencing. He faces a sentence of 10 to 20 years in prison and could be eligible for parole in less than five years, his attorney said.

Morrison said Raisch will be offered the same deal.

Taff sentenced for misuse of funds

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Former congressional candidate Adam Taff was sentenced Monday to 15 months in federal prison for using campaign funds to help get a loan for a $1.2 million home.

Taff, 40, of Lake Quivira, Kan., had sought a 12-month sentence split evenly between a halfway house and house arrest, after pleading guilty in November to one count of wire fraud and one count of violating the Federal Election Campaign Act.

Taff's co-defendant, John D. Myers, 51, of Leawood, Kan., was sentenced to five months in prison and a $50,000 fine on one count of wire fraud.

Taff, a moderate Republican, narrowly lost the 2004 primary for the GOP nomination in the 3rd District to conservative Kris Kobach. In 2002, when he was the Republican nominee, he lost to Democratic Rep. Dennis Moore in a tight race.

Prosecutors said Taff obtained a $300,000 bank check from campaign funds on Feb. 10, 2004, and he and Myers misrepresented the money as a down payment on a house in suburban Kansas City, Mo. to help the candidate get a mortgage. In seeking to downplay what happened, Taff argued the check drawn from campaign accounts was returned within an hour and was never negotiated.

But assistant U.S. Attorney Leon Patton argued in a presentencing memorandum that the crime was thought out because Taff did not have the personal funds to make the down payment when he agreed to buy the house in December 2003.

"Although it is correct that there was no financial loss, there was a greater loss than mere money," Patton wrote. "Mr. Taff caused a loss of trust and faith in our system of representative government."

Myers sold the house in Lake Quivira to Taff for $1.2 million. At the time, Taff worked for National Mortgage Co. Inc. Myers, who founded the company, was its chairman.

Because Taff had loaned his campaign about $125,000, he was accused of converting only $175,000 for his personal use.

The indictment also alleged that Taff falsely represented his campaign accounts as his personal holdings, and that he claimed more than double his actual monthly income of $6,500.

Because of the case, Taff, a former Navy fighter pilot, no longer can obtain the proper security and other clearances, meaning his flying career for both the military and commercial airlines is essentially over. He also could lose his military pension.

Jim Eisenbrandt, an attorney for Taff, declined comment.

Imprisoned Georgia woman who married 15-year-old boy gives birth to his child

By Harry R. Weber
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — A woman accused of molesting a 15-year-old boy she later married gave birth to the couple's child over the weekend, the woman's lawyer said Monday.

Lisa Clark, 37, gave birth to a 7-pound, 9-ounce boy Saturday, Daniel Sammons said.

The baby could be put in state custody unless Clark can arrange the necessary paperwork for a friend to take temporary custody, Sammons said. Clark was discharged from the hospital and returned to jail, where she is being held without bond.

"Right now, she's struggling with the trauma of having the child torn loose from her arms and possibly placed in foster care while she goes back to jail," Sammons said in a telephone interview.

Clark's teenage husband turned up in Ohio earlier this month after disappearing from a juvenile home in Georgia. It was not immediately clear where he was Monday.

District Attorney Lee Darragh did not return calls seeking comment.

A spokeswoman for Georgia's Division of Family and Children Services said the agency was not involved in the case.

Clark and the boy she is accused of molesting married in November. Georgia law allows children regardless of age to wed if there is a pregnancy.

Clark had been free on bond, but was arrested again last week after authorities said she had been communicating with her husband in violation of a condition of her release. Arraignment was set for Feb. 24.

Back in courtroom, Saddam lashes out at judge

By Hamza Hendawi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Prosecutors produced documents and put former aides to Saddam Hussein on the stand Monday as they made their strongest attempt yet to link him directly to torture and executions.

The ousted president, who looked disheveled and appeared in his slippers, shouted "Down with Bush!"

Saddam's half brother, Barzan Ibrahim, dressed only in an undershirt and long underwear, struggled with guards as he was pulled into the courtroom. Ibrahim, the former chief of intelligence, then sat on the floor with his back to the judge in protest for much of the session.

The defendants have rejected court-appointed attorneys named to replace their own lawyers who walked out of the trial last month, and are demanding the removal of chief judge Rouf Abdel-Rahman. In Jordan, Saddam's chief defense lawyer said there were no plans to end the boycott and denounced the court for forcing the former leader to attend.

"This is a cheap attitude," Khaled al-Dulaimi told The Associated Press.

After the raucous start, prosecutors tried to prove Saddam's role in a wave of arrests and executions that followed a 1982 attempt on his life in the Shiite village of Dujail.

Twenty-six prosecution witnesses have testified since the Saddam trial began Oct. 19, many providing accounts of torture and imprisonment in the crackdown, but they could not directly pin them on Saddam.

For the first time, the prosecution introduced documents and put two former members of Saddam's regime on the stand. The witnesses included one of his closest aides, Ahmed Hussein Khudayer al-Samarrai, head of Saddam's presidential office from 1984 to 1991 and then again from 1995 until Saddam's ouster in 2003.

Screens in the courtroom, including the press gallery, showed a document in Arabic dated to 1984 allegedly written and signed by Saddam in which he ratified "the execution of the Dujail criminals." A handwritten note at the bottom was allegedly by al-Samarrai.

Asked if the note was his handwriting, al-Samarrai, 62, said he could not be sure.

"I don't remember," he said. "I don't remember anything at all."

Another document shown in the court was a 1987 memo from the presidential office's legal department saying two people sentenced to death in connection with Dujail had not been executed and suggesting that they be released because of old age and that those responsible for the "oversight" should be investigated.

A note written in the margin at the bottom, allegedly in Saddam's handwriting, approved the investigation but says the two people should be spared execution "because we cannot allow luck to be more compassionate than us even when compassion here goes to the undeserving."

Prosecutors have said that they had documents showing that Saddam was closely following the crackdown. Asked if he recognized the handwriting on the memo, al-Samarrai replied, "Mr. President." That sparked a swift and angry correction from chief prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi and Abdel-Rahman, the chief judge. "Defendant Saddam Hussein," they shot back.

Al-Samarrai insisted he knew nothing about the events in Dujail except what he said he had heard on foreign radio broadcasts.

"I am not fit to be a witness in this case," he pleaded with Abdel-Rahman and al-Moussawi. "I don't want to be a witness."

Both al-Samarrai and the second witness, former intelligence official Hassan al-Obeidi, complained they too had been brought to the court against their will. Both are in custody in connection with other cases, according to al-Moussawi.

In Monday's session, two judges sitting on each side of Abdel-Rahman read affidavits of 23 prosecution witnesses, with further accounts of imprisonment and torture in the crackdown.

Saddam and his seven co-defendants are on trial in the killing of nearly 150 Shiite Muslims in Dujail. If convicted, they could face the death penalty by hanging.

Abdel-Rahman, who took over last month as chief judge, rode out the hearing's initial chaos by being both tough and accommodating, allowing Saddam and Ibrahim to talk, but interrupting them when they steered away from matters related to the case or if they spoke for too long.

Ibrahim was physically forced into the room Monday, shouting and struggling with guards holding him by the arms. Saddam and the other defendants walked in freely, apparently having decided to comply with the judge's order rather than risk getting the same treatment as Ibrahim.

But they made clear their opposition to being ordered to attend, with Saddam shouting chants against Bush.

Later, Abdel-Rahman rebuked Saddam for not rising when speaking to the court.

"I don't do this for a man who doesn't respect the law," Saddam replied. He argued that he could not be forced to accept court-appointed lawyers.

"We are implementing a law that was issued when you were president," Abdel-Rahman told him.

Even their dress signaled their defiance. Ibrahim appeared in long underwear and a white undershirt. His head was bare without the Arab headdress he insisted on wearing in past sessions as a mark of dignity.

Saddam carried a Quran in his left hand and wore a blue dishdashah — or traditional Arab robe — with a black overcoat and slippers, a stark contrast to the smart black suits he has worn to past sessions with a white handkerchief in his breast pocket.

"Why have you brought us with force?" Saddam shouted at Abdel-Rahman. "Your authority gives you the right to try a defendant in absentia. Are you trying to overcome your own smallness?"

"Degradation and shame upon you, Raouf," Saddam yelled. Later, he called the investigating judges "homosexuals."

The defiant performance of Saddam and Ibrahim won them instant praise from Saddam's daughter, living in Jordan.

"My father dealt well with the judge. Uncle Barzan is a very educated person and a hero, a real hero," Raghad Saddam Hussein told Al-Arabiya television. "My father has nothing to lose. ... After being the leader of Iraq for more than 35 years, he cannot be afraid of his life."

White House defends federal Katrina role, says critics are trying to rewrite history

By Lara Jakes Jordan
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — The Bush administration on Monday pushed back hard against Katrina-response criticism leveled by ex-disaster agency chief Michael Brown and congressional investigators.

"I reject outright the suggestion that President Bush was anything less than fully involved," said White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "unequivocally and strongly" rejected suggestions that his agency was preoccupied with terror threats at the expense of preparing for natural disasters.

Both spoke at a conference of state emergency management directors in suburban Alexandria, Va.

Their rebuttal came as a Republican-written House report blamed government-wide ineptitude for mishandling Hurricane Katrina relief. A report by Congress' investigative arm, the Government Accountability Office, reached similar conclusions and singled out Chertoff for delays.

Both Townsend and Chertoff took swipes at Brown, who resigned under pressure in September as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"There is no place for a lone ranger in emergency management," said Chertoff, whose Department of Homeland Security is FEMA's parent agency.

Brown testified before a Senate committee last week that he issued repeated warnings to the White House and DHS the day the hurricane struck, Aug. 29, that levees had failed and New Orleans was seriously flooding.

He suggested that the White House and DHS had dragged their feet. Bush and other federal officials have said they did not know until the next day, Aug. 30, that levees had been breached.

On Monday, Brown defended his performance.

"For Secretary Chertoff to claim that I failed to keep him informed belies the numerous telephone calls and e-mails between me and him prior to, during and after landfall" of the storm, Brown said in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

Brown also applauded congressional investigations into the government's response.

Townsend, without naming names, criticized those at FEMA she said had "become bitter" and lashed out "trying to find someone else, anyone else, to blame."

"We cannot attempt to rewrite history by pointing fingers or laying blame," Townsend said.

Townsend, who at Bush's request is conducting her own "lessons learned" inquiry, said her report would be released later this month.

A Senate panel is conducting a separate review due in March.

While both Chertoff and Townsend acknowledged that the federal response left much to be desired, both suggested federal officials up to Bush had been unfairly criticized.

Bush, who was traveling in Arizona and California the day the storm roared ashore, was "highly engaged" in monitoring its advance, Townsend said.

And she said it was Bush himself who first conceded several days after the storm — one of the nation's worst natural disasters — that "the response to the hurricane was insufficient."

The White House welcomes congressional inquiries into Katrina and the aftermath, and will cooperate with them, Townsend said.

House greenlights unattended child bills

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Parents who don't put their young children in booster seats or who leave them alone in vehicles would be punished under a pair of bills winning House approval Monday, giving advocates of tougher safety laws an important legislative victory.

The vote was 90-29 on the booster seat bill and 79-40 on the bill dealing with unattended children. Both measures went to the Senate.

Children's advocates began pushing for a booster-seat law in 2001, after a national group gave the state's child passenger safety law an "F." The Senate approved proposals in 2001, 2002, 2004 and 2005, only to see them die in the House.

However, 33 House members who voted against booster-seat legislation last year voted for it Monday. Among them was House Speaker Doug Mays, who said he had been persuaded that the bill would prevent injuries and deaths.

"I've seen enough proof over the past six months," said Mays, R-Topeka. "That's what turned me around."

State law requires children under 4 to ride in child safety seats and mandates that children age 4 through 13, drivers and front-seat passengers wear seat belts. But safety advocates say they've learned that without booster seats, belts often don't fit young children properly and can injure them severely in a crash.

One bill would require children ages 4 through 7 to ride in booster seats if they weigh 80 pounds or less or are under 4-foot-9. The bill would triple the fine for violating the law from $20 to $60.

The other bill makes it a misdemeanor for a licensed driver to leave a child under 9 in a car without someone else at least 13 years old. The fine for a first offense would be $25; it would be $250 to $500 for a second offense within three years.

Conservative legislators continued to argue the two bills represent too much government intrusion into families' lives. House Transportation Committee Chairman Gary Hayzlett, an opponent, doubted the measures could be enforced effectively.

"I think there are people up there who have thought about how they voted or maybe got pressure and changed their votes," said Hayzlett, R-Lakin.

House action came the same day Gov. Kathleen Sebelius helped launch a weeklong campaign to publicize the benefits of booster seats. She also announced the appointment of a special task force to study ways to reduce traffic deaths and injuries.

"I'm a believer that anything we can do to keep kids safe, we should do," she said.

Last year, 30 of the Senate's 40 members supported the booster seat legislation, suggesting this year's measure should pass and reach Sebelius' desk.

"Sooner or later — a lot of times later — common sense usually prevails," said Senate Transportation Committee Chairman Les Donovan, R-Wichita.

Cartoon contest draws entries

By Nasser Karimi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TEHRAN, Iran — An Iranian newspaper's contest for cartoons about the Holocaust, launched Monday in response to a series of caricatures about the Prophet Muhammad, has already drawn at least one entry, the paper said.

Hamshahri, one of Iran's top five newspapers, said its contest was a test of the Western world's readiness to print cartoons about the Nazi slaughter of 6 million Jews in World War II. It called for cartoons under the title: "What is the Limit of Western Freedom of Expression?"

The caricatures of the prophet, which first appeared in a Danish newspaper and were reprinted in several European newspapers that cited freedom of expression, have outraged Muslims and generated protests worldwide.

The first entry in the Iranian contest depicts a man smoking a cigarette and wearing a blue and white striped prison uniform, with a tall wall and guard tower in the background.

The man, with a mustache and several days growth of beard, is wearing a white keffiyeh and is holding his right hand over his forehead and eyes.

On his chest is a red Muslim crescent with a letter "P." Below that is the number 7256, the significance of which was not immediately clear, although Israel is said to be holding about 8,000 Palestinian prisoners.

The Brazilian artist listed as the author of the cartoon could not immediately be reached to confirm the entry was by him.

Masoud Shojai, chairman of the committee that will judge the contest, said an Australian was among those who sent entries to the contest last week before it was officially opened.

But Michael Leunig, one of Australia's best-known cartoonists, on Tuesday denied entering two of his works in the contest, saying he was the victim of fraud.

"I learned last night that some of my cartoons from a few years back have been submitted as an entry in that competition," Leunig told the Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio. "This is a fraud and hoax emanating, we believe, from Australia."

Leunig said he had been contacted late Monday by a concerned editor at Melbourne's The Age newspaper, which publishes many of his cartoons.

The cartoons were pulled from the Iranian newspaper's Web site after he contacted their editors, Leunig said.

"A reply came back, they were sorry, they removed the cartoon instantly without a quail and with an apology," he said.

An Iranian Web site for cartoonists carried a reproduction of the Brazilian entry and printed a notice at the top of the page that indicated it might also be connected to a conference sponsored by Iran's Foreign Ministry to examine what it called the scientific evidence surrounding the Holocaust.

Government witness No. 2 questioned in Enron trial

By Kristen Hays
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON — The government's first witness in the fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron Corp. chiefs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling was the company's top liaison with Wall Street. The second will be a top trader and division head who enjoyed a place in Skilling's inner circle.

Former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig was expected to finish testifying Tuesday, and then make way for Kenneth Rice, former head of the company's highly touted broadband unit that never lived up to its hype and was barely breathing when it crashed along with the parent into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001.

Both Koenig and Rice are among 16 ex-Enron executives who have pleaded guilty to crimes and are co-operating with prosecutors in hopes of receiving lenient punishments.

Koenig, who was Enron's chief liaison with Wall Street, has consistently described strictly work relationships with his former bosses. Rice and Skilling were friends as well, but have yet to face off in a courtroom.

Prosecutors contend Lay and Skilling repeatedly lied about Enron's financial health when they knew the company's success stemmed from complicated finance structures that hid debt and inflated profits.

The defense teams say there was no fraud at Enron and negative publicity coupled with loss of Wall Street confidence fueled its collapse.

Throughout his testimony that began nearly two weeks ago, Koenig stopped short of asserting that Skilling or Lay explicitly ordered fudged financial statements. But Rice already has implicated Skilling in an alleged web of lies about the capabilities of Enron's fledgling broadband network.

In the fraud and conspiracy trial of five former broadband executives last year, Rice testified that he, Skilling and most of the defendants in that case told analysts at a January 2000 conference that the network was up and running when it wasn't to generate Wall Street buzz and inflate the company's stock price.

Rice testified executives knew analysts might question an energy company's venture into broadband.

"Mr. Skilling liked to address issues head-on," Rice testified last year. "We addressed that concern by lying about the capabilities we already had on our network."

Within two days of the conference, Enron's stock price leaped from $54 a share to $72.

The 31 charges pending against Skilling include allegations that he lied to analysts about the network's capabilities. A videotape of Skilling's presentation played during the broadband trial showed he alternated between saying what the network could do at the time and what it would do in the future.

The distinction likely will dominate lead Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli's cross examination of Rice in the current trial.

Skilling tried to watch Rice testify last year, but he was a possible witness and therefore barred from the courtroom. At the time, Skilling said through Petrocelli, "My heart goes out to these guys. Hopefully, all the facts will come out, and they will be exonerated."

The broadband trial ended with acquittals on some counts and jurors hung on others. Those defendants are to be retried in three separate cases this year. The unit itself never made a profit.

Rice was a top trader and dealmaker at Enron. In 1999 Skilling tapped him to help run the broadband unit. He resigned from Enron in the summer of 2001, months before the company filed for bankruptcy protection.

Rice had been bound for trial alongside the other broadband executives until he cut a deal with prosecutors in July 2004.

The sports car aficionado also forfeited $13.7 million in cash and property, including a Ferrari, a Shelby coupe and a diamond, platinum and sapphire necklace and bracelet set he had bought for his wife, Theresa.

In June 2005, she filed for divorce, which became final last month, court records show.

KU student dies of seizure in hall

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — An honors physics student at the University of Kansas died after suffering from a seizure in a residence hall.

University police performed CPR on Andrew Rotman, 19, after he collapsed Sunday night in the hallway at Templin Hall. He was pronounced dead at Lawrence Memorial Hospital.

Rotman, of Cawker City, Kan., graduated from high school in 2005 and already had attained enough credits to be classified as a sophomore.

An autopsy was conducted Monday, but the results were not immediately released.

"The sudden loss of such a bright young man who was filled with promise and who had already begun an active college career in the short time he was at KU fills us with great sadness," Chancellor Robert Hemenway said in a prepared statement. "We offer our heartfelt condolences to his family and friends."

Teen sex ruling delayed

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — A federal judge won't rule this week on a challenge of Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline's interpretation of the state's sexual abuse reporting law.

Kline contends that the 1982 law that requires doctors, teachers and others to alert the state and law enforcement about child abuse also covers consensual sex between minors.

U.S. District Judge J. Thomas Marten said last week that he would try to issue his written opinion early this week.

The Center for Reproductive Rights, a New York advocacy group, filed the challenge. The group contends that forced reporting discourages adolescents from seeking counseling and treatment and violates the right to informational privacy.

The attorney general's office contends the statute requires mandatory reporting because sex is inherently harmful to underage children. In Kansas, the age of consent is 16.

help in the process, Klentz said.

"We get them set up at a table and explain the paint station," she said. "We show them how to use the stamps, stencil and sponge tools and have a design center with different books."

Once customers are done, it takes four days before the pieces are ready. Klentz and her workers take care of the firing process, which ensures the piece is microwaveable.

The studio also does community work, Klentz said.

"We work with school groups, 4-H and Girl Scouts," she said. "We have a wet clay studio so the Girl Scouts can get their badges."

Suicide bomber kills 10 Iraqis in Baghdad

By Robert H. Reid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A suicide bomber blew himself up Monday after joining a line of Iraqis waiting for government checks in a mostly Shiite district of Baghdad, killing 10 people and wounding about 40 — including women and children.

The attack occurred as more than 70 people lined up at a bank to receive government checks to compensate for incomplete food rations. Police said the bomber — who wore an explosives belt — stepped into the line and detonated his explosives as security guards were searching people before letting them in.

Ten people were killed and at least 40 wounded, Interior Ministry spokesman Maj. Falah al-Mohammedawi said. The wounded included three children and nine women, police said.

Late Monday, new television footage showed two hostage German engineers surrounded by masked gunmen. Al-Arabiya TV did not air audio from the tape, but said the kidnappers warned the German government it was the "last chance" to meet their demands or the men would be killed.

Thomas Nitschke and Rene Braeunlich were seized last month in Beijing, 115 miles north of Baghdad. No new demands were made, and the kidnappers did not set a deadline, the TV station said. In an earlier tape, the previously unknown Tawhid and Sunnah group called for Germany to cut ties with the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told reporters in Jerusalem the tape was "once again shocking evidence of human humiliation" and said the Berlin government "will continue our efforts to bring the two of them to safety as quickly as possible."

The U.S. military said Monday that American and Iraqi soldiers killed one insurgent and arrested 16 others in raids around the city of Muqadadiyah, northeast of Bagdad. The Sunday night raids involved units from the U.S. 4th Infantry Division and the 101st Airborne Division.

One Iraq soldier was slightly injured in the firefight in which the insurgent was killed, the military said.

Violence is continuing in Iraq as political leaders try to form a new government to include all sectarian and ethnic communities, a move the U.S. hopes will help calm the Sunni-led insurgency so American and other foreign troops can begin heading home.

On Sunday, Iraq's leading Shiite bloc picked Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari for another term, a major step toward forming a government. But Western diplomats cautioned the process of finalizing a new government has weeks if not months to go.

In a sign of the political difficulties ahead, Khalaf al-Ilyan, a senior official of a major Sunni Arab party, criticized al-Jaafari, calling his administration "the worst Iraq has so far experienced" because it failed to curb alleged human rights abuses by Shiite-led security services.

In Syria, Muqtada al-Sadr, an influential Iraqi Shiite Muslim cleric, held talks with Syrian Vice President Farouk al-Sharaa. The two discussed Syria's hope of restoring diplomatic ties with its Arab neighbor once a new government is in place, the official Syrian news agency reported.

Al-Sharaa told al-Sadr that Syria believed renewed ties would be "the basis for advancing bilateral relations and strengthening them in all fields," SANA reported.

Al-Sadr told SANA after the meeting that he expected improved ties.

The Shiite cleric, whose militia has fought U.S. troops and rival Shiite groups for prestige and power since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, has been meeting Middle East leaders during a tour of the region. He has been in Iran and also met in Syria with President Bashar Assad. He is scheduled to visit Lebanon as well.

Syria broke relations with Baghdad in 1982, accusing Iraq of inciting riots by the banned Muslim Brotherhood in Syria. Commercial ties improved during the last few years of Saddam's rule. He was overthrown after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

In addition to those slain in the suicide bombing Monday, at least 14 other people were killed nationwide.

Among those deaths, gunmen killed three brothers and two of their sons in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, police said. All five were members of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the country's leading Shiite political party.

Meanwhile, a prominent Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed al-Yaqoubi, called for a demonstration Tuesday in front of the British Consulate in the southern city of Basra to protest alleged abuse of Iraqi youths by British soldiers.

Video images first reported by the News of the World, a Sunday newspaper, appeared to show soldiers dragging several young Iraqis into a compound and beating them with fists and batons. The newspaper said the video was filmed in southern Iraq by a corporal two years ago. It did not name the soldier or the unit involved.

British military police said Monday they had arrested one man in their investigation of a video that appeared to show soldiers abusing prisoners in Iraq.

An Associated Press photographer who witnessed the demonstration that preceded the alleged beatings said it took place in Amarah, capital of Maysan province 180 miles southeast of Baghdad. Provincial Gov. Adel Mahudar confirmed the demonstration occurred near his office.

Proposals selected for committee review

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fifteen student fee bond surplus proposals were selected from 47 pre-proposals that were submitted to the Student Governing Association's Student Fee Bond Surplus Committee on Sunday.

Committee member Matt Wagner said the committee spent two hours Sunday night discussing the pre-proposals and selecting proposals for review.

Wagner said the committee selected proposals that would affect the entire student body and covered a range of the campus.

"The selection is just for the second presentation, and it doesn't mean we are going to guarantee any of them," Wagner said. "The committee just wants to hear more about these 15 proposals, and then we'll go from there."

Next week, project coordinators for the selected pre-proposals will give presentations to the committee and answer questions regarding their proposals.

On March 1, the Student Fee Bond Surplus Committee will announce its recommendation report on the project or projects that will receive one-time allocations from the account.

Student Body Vice President Grant Groene said the total amount requested from all 47 pre-proposals was $24,856,924, and the total amount requested from all 15 full proposals is $8,113,850, Groene said.

According to the Student Fee Bond Surplus proposal guidelines, K-State students have been paying off bonds

Selected pre-proposals

- Limiting student parking rate increases for future parking garage
- New automatic fire suppression system for K-State Student Union
- A financial counseling center at K-State
- Enhancing wireless Internet at K-State
- Proposal for creation of an audience response system
- KSU Child Development Center
- Project Solar House: the construction, transportation and installation of an experimental solar-powered facility at K-State

- Renovation of International Student Center's lounge and multipurpose room
- K-State Volunteer Center
- Audio and visual enhancements for McCain Auditorium
- K-State SafeRide Program
- Getting the full text of journal articles
- Unlocking the libraries with a Google search appliance
- K-State Challenge Course
- E-mail infrastructure for students and alumni used to pay for student-centered expansion and enhancement projects. A large reserve has accumulated in the surplus account, and $1.5 million has been allotted for projects that benefit the entire student body.

The committee can give less than the requested amount to the proposal, or the proposal could receive no funding. The money that is not awarded will continue to sit in the reserve account, Groene said.

Cause of 5 fires unknown

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the residents of Kearney and Vattier streets between Sixth and Seventh avenues, the sound of fire engines has become all too common.

Since January 2005 local residents have been harassed by fires.

Janet Weddel, 626 Vattier St., lost part of her garage, $30,000 and the inheritance from her recently deceased mother when her garage was set on fire in the early morning of New Year's Day, 2005.

Weddel said the instigators used a trash can to start the fire, which destroyed one-third of her garage.

"There was nothing left of my stuff but cinders," she said.

In August 2005 another fire was set at the house of Mary Turnbull, 627 Kearney St. The fire damaged an outbuilding garage so bad that the city condemned it, and there was almost $10,000 in additional damage to vehicles and equipment.

In a continuation of these events, the Manhattan Fire Department was called out for seven separate incidents Sunday — two of which occurred in the alley between Kearney and Vattier streets; all seven are under investigation.

Sunday's fires did minor damage to Tom McCoy's garage at K-State student returns to school after year in Iraq

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Instead of thinking about 21 shots like most students on their 21st birthday, Johanna Forgy had to think about getting things together and leaving for Iraq in 30 days.

Johanna, member of the 74th Quarter Master of the Kansas Army National Guard, left for Iraq in September 2004 and spent the year in the forward redistribution point in Blad, Iraq. She said items were sent to that unit from transmissions to notebooks. They then went through everything, put it into the other systems and sent it where it was needed.

She said her brother went into the military and she wanted to see if she could do it. There were many benefits to joining, mainly the money for college the military offers.

She came back to the U.S. in October and started back to school at the beginning of this semester. She said coming back was culture shock because her choices were made for her and now she had to make them.

"It crept me out," Johanna, junior in kinesiology, said. "Even going to the grocery store was even weird. It is just different, you think you will be so

Tax dollars benefit USD 383

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 has received $332,300 from the quarter-cent sales tax that was implemented in October 2005 to benefit public education.

For every dollar consumers spend within the city of Manhattan, one-quarter of a cent contributes to the funding of the district.

"When you're in a city that is growing and the prospects are obvious that we're going to grow more, it puts a tremendous strain on local school budgets," said Bernie Hayen, director of finance for Manhattan.

In April 2005, the tax was voted on and about 60 percent of Manhattan citizens favored the implementation of this tax to benefit local schools, Hayen said.

Taxation will continue until the schools receive a total funding of $5.4 million or until Sept. 30, 2008.

The district receives money from the city every month, but receives the payments a few months behind to allow the transactions to process, Hayen said.

So far, the district has received $160,600 for the month of October and $171,700 for the month of November.

The average amount of money received each month is about $170,000.

This, however, might change

Hunter has heart attack
CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas — The 78-year-old lawyer wounded by Vice President Dick Cheney in a hunting accident suffered a mild heart attack Tuesday after a shotgun pellet in his chest traveled to his heart, hospital officials said. Harry Whittington was immediately moved back to an intensive care unit and will be watched for a week. He was reported in stable condition.

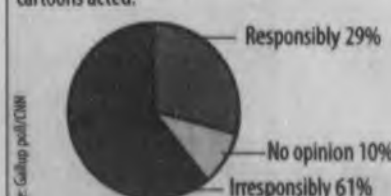

Wasting disease
KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Starting this week, Kansas wildlife officials plan to kill 50 deer in Cheyenne County, Kan., to test for chronic wasting disease. A whitetail doe shot near St. Francis during hunting season last fall was confirmed to have the disease — the first instance of it being found in Kansas. Kansas is the 11th state in which the disease has been found. The testing of animals will be done at K-State.

Cartoon protesters
LAHORE, Pakistan — Thousands rampaged through two cities Tuesday in violence against Prophet Muhammad. At least two people were killed in Lahore, where intelligence officials suspected outlawed Islamic militant groups incited the violence to undermine President Gen. Pervez Musharraf's U.S.-allied government.

DIVERSIONS

A waste of time — but hey, it's better than lecture

A quick guide to making some simple drinks

Tequila Sunrise

Ingredients:

- * 2 measures Tequila
- * Orange juice
- * 2 dashes Grenadine

Mixing instructions:

Pour tequila in a highball glass with ice, and top with orange juice. Stir. Add grenadine by tilting glass and pouring grenadine down side by flipping the bottle vertically very quickly. The grenadine should go straight to the bottom and then rise up slowly through the drink. Garnish with stirrer, straw and cherry or orange.

Margarita

Ingredients:

- * 1 1/2 oz Tequila
- * 1/2 oz Triple sec
- * 1 oz Lime juice
- * Salt

Mixing instructions:

Rub rim of cocktail glass with lime juice, dip rim in salt. Shake all ingredients with ice, strain into the salt-rimmed glass, and serve. For a frozen margarita, pour tequila, triple sec, lime juice and crushed ice into a blender. Blend well at high speed. Pour into a cocktail glass.

White Russian

Ingredients:

- * 2 oz Vodka
- * 1 oz Coffee liqueur
- * Light cream

Mixing instructions:

Pour vodka and coffee liqueur over ice cubes in an old-fashioned glass. Fill with light cream and serve.

Long Island Iced Tea

Ingredients:

- * 1/2 oz Vodka
- * 1/2 oz Tequila
- * 1/2 oz Light rum
- * Twist of Lemon peel (or lime)
- * 1/2 oz Gin
- * 1 dash Coca-Cola

Mixing instructions:

Mix all contents in a highball glass and stir gently. Add dash of Coca-Cola for the coloring and garnish with lemon or lime twist.

Sex on the Beach

Ingredients:

- * 1 oz Vodka
- * 3/4 oz Peach schnapps
- * Cranberry juice
- * Grapefruit juice

Mixing instructions:

Stir alcohol into a highball glass half-full of cranberry juice and grapefruit juice.

Speaker: Students should connect with black history

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

William Alexander Haley, son of "Roots" writer Alex Haley, gave a speech Tuesday in the Union Little Theatre sponsored by the Black Student Union and as a part of the Black History Month events taking place.

Haley, owner of Carolina Pinnacle Studios, the largest production company of its kind owned by an African American, delivered a short lecture, followed by a question-and-answer session with the audience.

The lecture focused mainly on historical issues.

Haley said much of what is being taught in schools today about American history, and African American history, isn't entirely valid.

"Most people don't know that in the 1600s, most people that came here were 'purchased' through indentured servitude — white and black," he said. "The importation of slaves began later ... but up through the Civil War, about 17 percent of the black population was free."

He said these facts don't change or excuse the issues of slavery and racism throughout the years.

However, the misconceptions help to stress the importance of finding out about one's history, an issue Haley said he finds important.

"If you're going to 'do' black history, look up your family," Haley said. "Those people that you come from, they were people that were brave and that you can look up to."

Haley said academic journals say "something happened back in 1860," but what "Roots" did was to look at the story of his family, and how they lived through certain historical events, instead of just focusing on the events themselves.

Haley also answered questions from audience members on a range of topics, from racism to which civil rights leader he most identified with.

"It's damaging," Haley responded to a question about racism in today's society, "because we accept it. But you don't have to accept it. If you feel uncomfortable, all you have to do is raise your voice. You just have to stand up for your own rights."

When asked about how to better promote black history on a college campus, Haley said the best way to do it was to personalize it.

"It's how you tell a story that determines how people are going to react to it," he said.

Kiana Smith, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, said she feels it is important for students to listen to a member of an older generation.

"I think it's important ... for people from our generation to hear from someone with experiences like his, so we can ask about issues like racism, and how to respond," she said.

Josh Criswell, BSU president and junior in social sciences, said he enjoyed the speech.

"I thought it was great," he said. "Really insightful and knowledgeable. It's really something that this dedicated group of people needed to hear."

Criswell said BSU has similar events once or twice a month, though they don't always bring in speakers.

He also expressed a desire for more K-State students

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

to come out and experience events taking place, not only for Black History Month, but for all kinds of diversity events.

"I think a lot of members of the majority are afraid to come out and even just sit through something like this," Criswell said. "Their comfort levels just aren't there yet."

For students who would like to be involved with any minority organization on campus, Criswell said he recommends stepping out of their comfort zone and getting involved.

"Try us out," he said. "We're extremely accepting."

Haley said he enjoys speaking with audiences on college and high school campuses, because that way he is able to get a feel for what young people think about different issues, and how much they know about them.

"It helps to relate to them, and to be able to help them and determine which issues we should be helping them with," he said.

Haley concluded with words of advice for his younger audience members.

"There's no promise that you don't have," he said. "You just have to have the desire to fulfill your dreams."

Fair offers internships, job opportunities

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Hospitality and Recreation and Travel Career Fair will take place from noon to 4 p.m. Thursday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom. The event is sponsored by the Department of Hotel, Restaurant and Institution Management and Dietetics, the departments of horticulture, forestry and recreation resources, and Career and Employment Services.

More than 30 employers will attend the fair, including Marriott International and the Walt Disney World Co.

Mary Ellen Barkley, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said she was pleased with the variety of companies recruiting at K-State.

"There will be a great and wide selection of employers participating, whether you're interested in high-end hotels, casinos or the Kansas City Zoo," she said.

Students attending the fair should wear business casual attire and bring multiple copies of their résumés, Barkley said. She also said portfolios, business cards and notebooks for recording follow-up information might also be useful.

Andrea Oltjen, junior in hotel and restaurant management, was a student member of the Hospitality and Recreation and Travel Fair Committee who helped organize the fair.

One of the committee's goals in planning the event was drawing more employers than the previous year, she said.

"Last year we had about 22 employers," Oltjen said. "This year we have 32. We really wanted students to have the opportunity to get internships and interview with lots of potential employers."

Oltjen said the fair is an opportunity for hotel, restaurant and institution management students to make connections.

"Students should attend because it's a way to network with employers, to get a foot in the door," she said. "It's a free chance to meet with these employers and get your résumé out there."

Pat Pesci, director of the hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics department, said students can make connections at the career fair that could later result in a job. He said employers continue to recruit at the fair year after year because of students' experience in the hospitality field.

"Finding students at the fair is more effective than taking out an ad in a newspaper that could be answered by someone with no knowledge of the industry," he said.

No pre-registration for the fair is required. A list of employers attending and additional information on the fair is available on the Career and Employment Services Web site.

New Web site coming

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new K-State home page will be launched Sunday night and was the topic of discussion at the Faculty Senate meeting Tuesday afternoon.

The site has been designed with input from Web statistics and research on university Web sites. Off-campus consultants were hired for testing with the new site.

The Web site features a listing of student services and daily news updates. It also has links on the home page addressing new audiences such as those involved with the military and families, Sharon Morrow, director of University Publications, said.

"The current Web site is a little more than five years old, and it was cool at the time," Morrow said.

Neil Erdwien, Web technology manager for Computing and Network Services, said the new Web site has goals of enhancing functionality, branding and uniformity.

The "single sign-in" feature, which will allow students to sign in all at once to Webmail, KATS and K-State Online, will not be in effect for a few more weeks.

TO THE POINT Education is key to preventing unwanted STDs

In observance of sexual awareness week, now would be a good time to educate yourself on safer sex practices.

Some people might think that putting on a condom ruins all the fun. However, the consequences of not wearing one can be a lot more damaging.

Don't buckle under pressure from an immature sexual partner.

The prevalence of college-aged students contracting a sexually transmitted disease is high, so being concerned with practicing safer sex should be in the mind of any sexually active student.

Being mature enough to openly talk about contraceptives with your partner shows a deeper level of emotional commitment between the both of you.

Also, it's not just up to the man to initiate the conversation. Women need to protect themselves and shouldn't assume that their partner will take charge.

The recent surge in condom products geared toward women has opened the door for more responsible sexual habits. Women should always carry a condom with them, if sexually active, just to be on the safe side.

Abstinence is the only true way of preventing STDs and unwanted pregnancies, but you don't have to eliminate sex from your life to practice safer sex.

Communicate with your sexual partner early on. If you decide to get it on, use protection.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Wretched recall

Sending troops back to war affects all involved

A good number of people choose to serve in America's military.

For some it is patriotic — some have nothing better to do. I hear that immigrants use it to gain citizenship, which seems an even trade to me.

For all the sacrifice people endure during their tenure, it seems poor doings to haul them back into duty after their time is up.

The Individual Ready Reserve, the tool of the recall, may have its merits; not many former service members would complain if they were called to go to New Orleans, in the wake of Katrina for a month or two. But, it seems unlikely that the purpose of this was to fill boots when recruitment levels were low.

This military recall has been executed with all the intelligence that the government can muster, that is, none at all.

It happened to me, but after handling my own business for three years I didn't take kindly to having to ask to use the can; who would?

I was released upon the base shrink's advice.

For those who remained entrapped, the affair was a lesson in cynicism.

Some were single mothers and fathers wondering what would happen to their children. They couldn't take them with them and couldn't expect someone else to baby-sit them for 18 months.

The Army didn't care.

Some were college graduates who could have taken on greater responsibility, even qualified to be an officer. They were sent back to their old jobs at lower enlisted ranks.

The Army didn't care.

Many showed up thinking reasonable people would understand; they didn't.

The results were formulaic — people arrive, proud of their service, become disheartened, disillusioned and finally, resentful. Moral was abysmal, grown men were crying.

What do the embittered do?

They go home and tell their friends, their children, the school board, the people at church. Every time someone mentions enlisting, they get a face-full of former service members telling them, with due emphasis, don't.

About everybody knows someone who knows someone, who's related to someone who's had to deal with recall.

"Hey, did you hear about my friend's cousin? Been out for three and a half years and the Army called him back. Had to leave his wife and new baby. You still planning on joining up?"

Take a guess.

The media likes to think that the "danger" of deployment is keeping recruitment low. Fact is, young men like danger. They climb mountains and race cars — thousands volunteered to go to Vietnam.

But people like to know they can do their bit and move on without Uncle Sam saying,

"hang on, I know you've given me four years, but you OWE ME two more."

Also, one could reason if the U.S. was famished for troops, it might quit sending them to every hole in the globe.

Do we still need military in Bosnia — Europe can't cut its own grass?

What about Kosovo, Israel, Egypt, Paraguay, Columbia, Honduras? Do any of these sound like vital areas for national security?

This recall business is poor.

No one wins — people have their lives interrupted, commanders get unwilling troops, the military gets fewer recruits, while an aggressive deployment schedule ensures a vigorous pissing away of national resources.

Let's reign in our politicians and our military a bit before things get out of hand.

People have better things to do than come running when the government whistles.

Irresponsible adults should not have children

According to the Associated Press, in Littleton, Colo., on Tuesday, Feb. 7, a woman delivered a baby 3 months premature in a toilet.

She called 911 and the police saved the child once they realized it was still alive. The baby girl was taken to a hospital, where she will be watched over until she gains about 4 more pounds.

The mother, who told police the child was a miscarriage when they arrived at the scene, clearly did not know how to handle a birth. More information about the mother and her actions are unavailable because of privacy laws, but this brings to light the problem of pregnancy in America today.

There are so many other stories in the media beside this one highlighting cases of irresponsible parents who simply are not prepared or excited to have children. There are several cases of babies who have been left in dumpsters, abandoned in trash bags floating down rivers or left on doorsteps of adults who might actually want a child.

Many times, a condom break or a rush of passion can turn into a lifetime of caring for a child.

Those few minutes of self-indulgence with a partner now leads to a life of a baby who is simply not wanted.

Several parents forgo an abortion, either because they cannot afford it or because they do not believe in it.

But is this fair for the child, who will be held in moments of contempt by the parents who irresponsibly caused their creation?

At grocery and department stores, it seems one cannot browse the shelves or racks without hearing a parent scolding their child. Many times, it is simply the child's curiosity that causes them to be harshly spoken to or yanked by the arm.

This makes one believe the child is simply an annoyance, a reminder or punishment of a night of infatuation. A child's life shouldn't be lived as a sign of regret. They did not ask to be born. But when it comes down to it, they were born, so they deserve to be loved.

With thousands of children in orphanages and foster care because of unfit or runaway parents, it's not fair that unsafe sex is still happening.

Babies are still being born when there are wonderful kids waiting to be adopted. Many parents feel they simply will abort the baby or give it up for adoption, unaware this will have an effect on the rest of their lives, including the child's, if they carry through with the pregnancy.

It is mind-blowing, the amount of people, who consider themselves adults, simply do not care about protecting themselves against STDs, HIV/AIDS and unwanted pregnancy.

Condoms do not 'ruin the moment.' They are a lifesaver. They prevent you from getting something you don't want.

Babies don't deserve to be born into a situation where they are not wanted. They deserve to be happy, to be born into a family that loves them and are ready and excited to have a child.

Nice package

Discreet boxes gives female shoppers options when buying condoms

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some students agree that it might be difficult to buy condoms, especially in the case of females.

"I feel more people would use condoms if they felt more comfortable buying them," said Sandra McLeod, sophomore in open-option and member of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators.

Trojan brand condoms is aware of the taboo of women buying sexual products and has created a brand named Alexa, which keeps the woman's needs in mind, according to www.alexabytrojan.com.

Alexa is a line of sexual well-being products, including freshening cloths, vibrating ring, condoms and intimacy gel.

The Web site explains Alexa is made with the woman's perspective in mind. The discrete packaging uses dark colors and a cartoon outline of a woman in a seductive pose.

"I think it makes it easier," Angela Sims, freshman in English, said. "It's in a cute box, and it doesn't say 'Trojan' on the box. It just says 'Alexa'."

According to www.namedevelopment.com, the name Alexa is derived from the greek goddess Alexa, which is the "protector of mankind."

"I think that it's an awesome idea," said Mandy Colthart, junior in nutrition and exercise science and a SHAPE member.

"It gives people an easier way of approaching something they wouldn't try usually, like the vibrating ring."

Alexa brand doesn't just focus on condoms.

The Web site features other sex products, including the vibrating ring, a soft ring powered by a battery designed to enhance pleasure for both partners.

However, the vibrating ring is banned in eight states, including Kansas.

Alexa also makes freshening cloths similar to the Summer's Eve version.

According to the Web site, the cloths are designed to give you and your partner a extra bit of freshness before and after an intimate situation.

The last product Alexa offers is the intimacy gel. According to the Web site, this gel is clear and non-greasy and adds warmth when a sensitive area is simulated, increasing the pleasure factor.

"I think that Trojan is making an attempt to give women a chance to be more protective without being considered a ho for buying condoms," Jessica Smith, graduate student in business administration, said.

XM radio signs

3-year deal with Oprah

NEW YORK — XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. on Thursday said it signed a three-year, $55 million deal with Oprah Winfrey to introduce a channel on the top U.S. subscription radio service, sending shares up as much as 10 percent.

The new channel, called "Oprah And Friends," is scheduled to launch in September and will include a weekly show hosted by Oprah, as well as programs featuring other personalities from her popular nationally syndicated TV talk show.

"We're done with the big programming deals," XM Chief Executive Officer Hugh Panero told Reuters in an interview. "With this last piece of the puzzle, after you sign a deal with the likes of Oprah, we see nothing else on the horizon of this magnitude."

Talks with Oldman begin for 'Potter' film

LOS ANGELES — Gary Oldman is in negotiations to reprise his role as Sirius Black for Warner Bros. Pictures' fifth Harry Potter installment, "Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix."

When principal photography on the David Yates-helmed movie started Feb. 6 at the U.K.'s Leavesden Studios, negotiations with Oldman had not begun. That led to speculation in the British press that Oldman would not be returning and the part would have to be recast.

"We're not shooting his part for quite a while, and as is always the case, you begin with the parts that are most pressing," "Potter" producer David Heyman said. "We have every intention of having Gary Oldman play Sirius Black."

Four original series in works at Logo

LOS ANGELES — Logo, MTV Networks' new gay- and lesbian-themed channel, said Monday it has four original scripted series in development, including two animated projects.

The animated series are the gay domestic comedy "Rick and Steve" and "Slink," centering on five lesbian cats who inherit a mansion in Malibu.

"The Rules: A Lesbian Survival Guide" is a live-action comedy about a single woman looking for love, based on the short film by Michelle Paradise and Lee Friedlander.

Battle of the Sexperts teams to entertain, educate

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Battle of the Sexperts

When: 8 p.m. Thursday
Where: Union Courtyard
How much: Free

K-State students will have the opportunity to see just who of their peers has the most "sexpertise" on Thursday night. Battle of the Sexperts, hosted by the Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators (SHAPE) and Lafene Health Center, will take place at 8 p.m. in the Union Courtyard.

According to the SHAPE Web site, a "sexpert" is someone who "possesses knowledge regarding sexual health and responsible decision-making."

The battle is a competition between teams of three to five students, who will have to discuss and answer questions about sex issues, as well as participating in activities "that may be unusual," according to the site.

"This is the fourth annual event," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center.

She said the idea for the competition came from a Union Program Council-sponsored speaker who called himself a "sexpert."

"We (SHAPE members) thought, 'we should have a contest using that word,'" Kennedy said. "Plus, we've found that college students are drawn to that kind of 'edgy' title."

Kennedy also said the event usually has a good turnout, both for participants and audience members.

"This year there are 11 teams, which is pretty good," Lindsay Hicks, senior in sociology, said. "I think last year we had 10, so we feel good about having 11 this year — any more and we probably would have had too many."

Hicks said the teams will participate in a relay race involving different objects, as well as trivia questions about sexual health and how to protect oneself.

"There's more," she said, "but it's a surprise for the teams."

Kennedy said the teams will be scored by a three-judge panel.

"We have our own resident sexpert, Dr. Wendy Blank, who is the director and physician at the Women's Clinic, and she will have two SHAPE members working with her on the panel," she said.

Katie Kuhlman, senior in biology, said she's excited about this year's competition.

"It's going to be like a game show to figure out who the best 'sexpert' is," Kuhlman said. "It's going to be a really good time. There will be games to figure out who has the best pick-up lines, and all the trivia — it's going to be great."

Hicks said all are welcome to come and watch the competition, but the participants will only be K-State students.

"It's going to be really fun," Kuhlman said. "We think everyone should come out and see it, enjoy it, and hopefully learn something."

Men's golf finishes 6th in season opener in Florida

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State freshman Robert Streb went into Tuesday's final round of the two-day Matlock Collegiate tied for fourth place. After the round, he ended up with the best finish of his young career.

Streb fired a three-over 219 (72-75-72) and helped lead the Wildcats to a sixth-place finish Tuesday at the 7,065-yard, par-72 Grasslands Golf and Country Club in Lakeland, Fla.

He did not know where he stood during his final round and said he was shocked to hear how well he did after the tournament finished.

"I was pretty surprised with where I ended up, because I had a couple mental errors that led to three-putts, and I felt I could have shot three-under instead of even par," Streb said. "Overall, I am definitely happy with my performance and bringing home a second place."

Streb's previous best finish was a tie for 16th at the Memphis Intercollegiate, Oct. 3-4.

Even with Streb's performance, Coach Tim Norris said he knows his team did not play as well as expected. He said the greens were speedy and firm, which was part of the reason the Wildcats struggled.

"This was a starting point, but I thought we would be a lot better off because we were able to practice outdoors in January, which is a rarity," Norris said. "This course was not U.S. Open quality, but it definitely played quite a bit tougher than in years past."

After shooting two rounds of 305 and 307 to hold the eighth spot going into Tuesday, the Wildcats improved nine strokes in the final round to card a 298, jumping up two spots to sixth overall.

Leading the charge for the Wildcats were three newcomers to the team this season in Streb, fellow freshman Joe Kinney, and Johnson County Community College junior transfer Jay Kramer.

Kinney and Kramer both tied for 35th after they each shot a 14-over 230, making them big contributors to the team's sixth-place finish.

Senior Tyler Cummins tied for 39th, carding a 15-over 231, and sophomore Kyle Yonke tied for 62nd with 237.

Florida Southern's top golfer, Greg Koch, not only helped defend his team title, but also defended his individual title by firing a one-under 215. Koch was the only golfer to shoot below par for the tournament.

Florida Southern won the tournament with a 27-over 891, followed by West Florida's 893 and Lynn's 894.

VLB | Fritz to assist

USA Volleyball A2 team

K-State volleyball coach Suzie Fritz has been appointed as an assistant coach for the 2006 USA Women's National Volleyball A2 Team, USA Volleyball has announced. Fritz was chosen by Team USA head coach and head coach of the Florida Gators, Mary Wise.

Fritz

Fritz has a record of 112-44 (.718) in five seasons at the helm of the Wildcat volleyball program. She ranks second in K-State history for wins and was the fastest coach to 100 career wins.

Fritz led K-State to its 10th-straight appearance in the NCAA Tournament and its seventh-straight 20-win season in 2005.

Fritz guided K-State to its first Big 12 Conference title in 2003 and steered the squad to an appearance in the "Sweet 16" of the NCAA Tournament.

Team USA will train from May 22-26 in New Orleans. The 12-player squad then will compete in the Women's Open Division of the USA Volleyball Adult Open Championships May 27-30 at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center.

for U.S. in downhill skiing

TORINO, Italy — Young Ted Ligety gave the United States the Olympic gold medal that Bode Miller couldn't deliver Tuesday night, uncorking two dynamic slalom runs to win the men's combined and break the Americans' bad luck in Alpine skiing.

The 21-year-old skier from Park City, Utah, in his first Olympics, had a combined time of 3 minutes, 9.35 seconds for the downhill and two slalom runs. Ivica Kostelic of Croatia won the silver medal, 53-hundredths of a second behind the American at 3:09.88. Rainer Schoenfelder of Austria captured into Snyder's departure

COLUMBIA, Mo. — The University of Missouri will investigate the handling of Coach Quin Snyder's sudden departure last week, university officials said Tuesday.

Snyder

stepped down Friday, a day after vowing to finish his seventh season at the school. The Kansas City Star reported that athletic director Mike Alden sent Gary Link, a basketball analyst who also is his special assistant, to inform Snyder that he would not be retained.

The investigation apparently will begin with an interview of Link, who has had no comment about his role in the matter.

NBA | SuperSonics send
Radmanovic to Clippers

SEATTLE — The Seattle SuperSonics traded forward Vladimir Radmanovic to the Los Angeles Clippers for Chris Wilcox on Tuesday.

Radmanovic, who will be a free agent after the season, has struggled for the past month despite being put in the starting lineup after new coach Bob Hill took over on Jan. 3. Since Jan. 11, Radmanovic has scored in double figures only four times in 13 games and recently was benched in favor of forward Nick Collison.

Radmanovic, who turned down a $42 million, six-year deal with the Sonics before the season and signed a one-year tender instead, is averaging 9.3 points. Because he signed a one-year tender, Radmanovic had the right to block the trade.

The speed of Smith

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Senior Christian Smith set a new collegiate record two weeks ago when he clocked in at 2 minutes, 19.57 seconds in the 1,000-meter run at the Sevigne Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb. Smith has been a runner since the second grade.

After stumbling into sport, track star sets new collegiate record

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christian Smith began running for the same reason most people start running.

He was forced into it. "I did a two-mile road race when I was in second grade on the Fourth of July," said Smith, a senior on K-State's track and field team. "My older brother kind of forced me into it. I kept doing fun runs through junior high, then high school running, and it went from there."

All that running at a young age has paid off for Smith, who, two weeks ago, set a new collegiate record in the 1,000-meter run, with a time of 2 minutes, 19.57 seconds at the Sevigne

Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

"It was exciting to break the record," he said. "I had wanted that record for a couple of years, and there was a lot of pressure I put on myself to get it, so it was kind of a relief."

Smith nearly broke it at a race two years ago, finishing short by only one-tenth of a second.

The Garfield, Kan., native said he started thinking about breaking the record as early as last summer.

"I knew the Nebraska race was the one to do it," he said. "I really wanted the record."

Along with the national record, Smith also broke his own K-State record by one second, his own venue (the Bob Devaney Sports Center) record by one second and the Husker Invitational record by six seconds.

Smith said he credits his older brother with helping him become a better runner and is quick to reference his coaches with aiding in his development.

"Running behind him in high school was a good motivator for me," he said. "Also, the coaches here have really touched up my training and put in a lot of hard work to help me out. Coach [Mike] Smith has really helped out a lot."

Smith, who is ranked No. 10 in the country in the 800-meter run by www.trackwire.com, barely missed advancing to the finals of the Olympic Trials in 2004.

Then a sophomore bat-

"It was exciting to break the record. I had wanted that record for a couple of years, and there was a lot of pressure I put on myself to get it, so it was kind of relief."

Christian Smith

ting nerves, he missed the finals by three-hundredths of a second.

He said then he hoped to try and qualify for the Olympics or a World Championship team in the future.

Coach Cliff Rovelto was complimentary of Smith and his 1,000-meter record.

"That was a great run," Rovelto said. "It was just a phenomenal effort."

Smith is now automatically qualified for the NCAA

Indoor Championships in the 1,000-meter run, with his record-breaking time, and has provisionally qualified for the 800-meter run and the mile run.

So what runs through the mind of a near Olympic-caliber runner during a race?

"I guess I think mostly about the competition that I'm racing against," he said. "I think about my strategy a lot, as well."

Gambling the worst thing that can happen in sports world

The National Hockey League finally found a way onto the front page for the first time since it announced the end of the lockout that composed the entire 2004-05 season.

It had nothing to do with the play on the ice, TV ratings or the break players will take to play for their countries in the Olympics.

The news is the worst thing that can happen in sports.

Gambling. Gambling on sports is the worst thing a player or coach can be associated with, even if the bets are not placed on the sport they play.

Phoenix Coyotes assistant coach Rick Tocchet, a former NHL player, will be arraigned on charges of promoting gambling, money laundering and conspiracy later this week in association with a gambling ring dubbed, "Operation Slap Shot."

According to a New Jersey State Police report released last week, in a 40-day period, the gambling ring processed more than 1,000 wagers exceeding $1.7 million.

The report, which began in late October 2005, also linked the ring to the Bruno-Scarfo Crime Family of La Cosa Nostra, which operates in Philadelphia and New Jersey.

The moment there is a possibility a game might have been fixed, that sport loses the element of surprise and becomes the World Wrestling Entertainment.

A scripted event that is nothing more than a soap opera involving faked-tan steroid freaks in tights.

Sports would rather be full of cheaters who abuse their bodies with drugs or just bad people in general, rather than have the gambling cloud hang above their heads.

It's easy to ban players from your league for individual occurrences; that only hurts their image. But an allegation of gambling can destroy an entire league, because everyone involved, or even associated with the said player, becomes linked to the crime.

There is a reason why every professional and collegiate locker room has a sign about the dangers of gambling and to avoid getting involved.

The bets placed have been reported not to involve the NHL, but mostly football and collegiate sports.

It does not matter. Placing bets leads to debts, which leads to athletes becoming targets, who are willing to throw games in order to make sure their bookie wins.

The moment money is wagered by a player or coach is the moment you have to begin to question their motivations.

Are they just betting on other sports? How deep in the hole are they? Would they ever consider throwing a game in order to fix a game so someone else can win?

Ultimately, are they affecting the outcome of the game?

These are questions that garner the headlines. But not one sport wants this attention.

Especially one trying to recover from the longest work-stoppage in sports and bring back its fans like the NHL is.

FIRES | Riley County police unable to determine origins of fires

607 Kearney St., but gutted Susan Oneil's garage at 601 Kearney St.

The recent events have shaken residents of the area, some of whom are upset about the continuing events.

"They seem to be pretty confident that no one's going to catch them," Weddel said.

All of the fires thus far have involved detached structures - garages, sheds and, recently, mailboxes that are separated from the occupied residences. But some residents have expressed concern that the fires will spread to occupied buildings.

Lt. Mike Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said for these investigations the RCPD works in tandem with the Manhattan Fire Department.

The MFD performs the majority of the crime scene investigation, with the RCPD assisting if criminal proceedings become necessary.

"Anything they want done that isn't in their expertise they would ask us, and we would ask them," Quintanar said.

Don Francis, assistant chief of the MFD, said the fire department was still in the process of determining the cause of the recent fires, and that it was too early to determine whether the fires were intentional or not.

"We can't rule out that it could have been an accidental fire," he said.

Francis also said given the many fires in such a short time frame on Sunday morning, it is likely the fires are tied together.

But, some residents of Vattier and Kearney streets are feeling the information about the crimes, and assurance the fires are over has been slow in coming.

"We want an end to this, and we want it now," Weddel said.

DISTRICT | School board braces for influx of military families

soon, as the next payment the district will receive will be for the month of December, which is one of the two largest retail months for Manhattan, Hayen said.

December is a month of large tax collection due to the amount of money spent during the holiday season. The other large retail month is September, when students are doing back-to-school shopping, Hayen said.

The purpose of the money received by the taxation is to sustain quality educational opportunities within the district and maintain appropriate infrastructure and programs to accommodate expected additional military families, said Bruce Stiles, business director for USD 385.

Though few specifics are known, a proposal will come before the school board in the next couple of weeks asking them to hire a full-time office professional to help with new student enrollments in the summer, said Michele Jones, coordinator of communications and public relations for USD 385.

As of Monday morning, the district had received a total of 149 new military-related students, which averages to about two new students every day since Sept. 20, 2005, Jones said.

While the military is not giving any specific numbers, they have told the district more new families are expected to move into the Manhattan area, she said.

"We've never been in this situation, or at least not for quite some time - with a big influx of students coming in," Jones said. "It could be a fairly substantial number throughout the summer."

Previously, the district has shut down over the summer and enrolled new students at the beginning of August. However, with new students expected, the district wants to accommodate new families, which is why the additional office professional is needed, Jones said.

"We're just trying to anticipate the needs of those families," Jones said. "Moving is a stressful time, so if we can make that a little easier on the students and families, that's what we want to do."

FORGY | Soldier finds transition from Iraq to Manhattan difficult

happy, but you need so much guidance. You almost want someone to make decisions for you."

She said the military is about respect for rank, and school is so much different because students don't have to go to class if they don't want to. She said she was so happy to be home, but she is still dealing with it.

Johanna said even sitting in class was a different atmosphere.

She no longer had to wear her uniform every day, carry her M-16 rifle or wear her bulletproof vest.

"It was an emotional roller coaster," she said. "Coming back is not an easy transition."

Johanna said she is proud she went to Iraq and served her country.

"I didn't want to go - I don't think anyone ever wants to go," she said. "I knew I had to do my duty."

Johanna said she communicated with her family as much as possible through letters and e-mails. She said she couldn't put into words how much it meant to get a letter.

Johanna's best friend, Mariah Mangas, was very supportive of her and wrote her every chance she had.

Mangas, senior in art education, said she wrote Forgy at least once a week. She said she was angry when she found out her best friend and roommate was going to Iraq.

"I had just had a brother go over there, and I thought reserve meant that you wouldn't be called up," she said.

She said she didn't notice any significant changes in Johanna and said it was like she never left. The only thing that may have changed is now she feels like she has to do things all the time.

"She dropped any negativity she may have had as soon as she got back onto American soil," she said. "Johanna is strong in every sense of the word."

Mangas said she has a large amount of respect for her and said she is glad she is back, and they can hang out whenever they want.

Carol Forgy, Johanna's mother, said she couldn't explain how she felt while her daughter was in Iraq.

"We worried about her every day," said Carol, a resident of Onaga, Kan. "As a mother, that is not somewhere you want to send your child. It was tough, we prayed a lot."

She said her daughter is still the "same Johanna," but is still trying to get back into the swing of things. Carol said one of the hardest things to deal with was that she couldn't pick up the phone and call her.

"It was one of the toughest things I have ever gone through," Carol said. "I will always be her mom no matter how old she is, and I am extremely proud of her."

Johanna said she would like to be a physical therapist assistant after she graduates from K-State and would like to one day get her master's.

She said she has no negative feelings toward the war. "I do believe we went over there and got Saddam," she said. "We are helping them build their government, but I do want the military to come home as soon as possible."

Elgas' run as top Cat comes to a close

Wooldridge to return to bench after surgery recovery

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There were several coaching templates that, as of Tuesday afternoon, were possible in K-State's game against Texas Tech tonight.

Let's see ... would assistant coach Jimmy Elgas be assuming the head-coach position again tonight? Would Elgas be accompanied by Coach Jim Wooldridge, quietly assisting court-side? Would Wooldridge even make the trip down to Lubbock, Texas, as he'd hoped, despite ongoing pain from surgery Feb. 8?

On Tuesday evening, the speculation ended, when Wooldridge announced he would coach the Wildcats' game at 7 tonight. He attended practice Tuesday for the first time since Feb. 6, two days before his surgery that removed a bulging disc from his neck.

Wooldridge's announcement ended Elgas' two-game head-coaching stint — his first ever in his 15-year career as a basketball coach.

After the 74-71 Missouri loss on Sunday, Elgas said the basketball program couldn't wait for Wooldridge to heal and come back. He's the heart beat of the team, the interim coach said.

"We want him back as soon as he can," Elgas said. "These are his guys — we work for him, he's the spirit, he's the energy

K-State assistant basketball coach Jimmy Elgas celebrates after K-State beat Iowa State on Feb. 8 at Bramlage Coliseum. The win was Elgas' first victory — and game — as interim coach for Jim Wooldridge.

— he's everything to our team and our staff."

For one week, Elgas became the spirit of the Cats, and while his 1-1 head-coaching career was short lived, it was a smooth one, thanks to the communication between Elgas and Wooldridge, sophomore guard Clint Stewart said.

"He's (Elgas) been in touch with Coach Wooldridge every day and just telling us the same thing coach Wooldridge has been telling us," Stewart said. "It's the same path, and we respect him as a coach, and we know what he's telling us is right."

Elgas proved in K-State's games against Iowa State and Missouri that he could adjust to the demands of coaching in the Big 12 Conference. During competition, he was out of his seat more than he was in it and directing his players as though he'd done it for years. It wasn't hard for senior Dramane Diarra to identify what made Elgas a good coach.

"His energy," Diarra said. "He always gets us to play hard. He comes with so much energy, and I think that helps us a lot."

Wooldridge also made clear how impressed and confident he was in his assistant coaching staff — including Elgas, Charles Baker and Ben Kelso — during his time away.

"Jimmy and the other coaches have done a great job," Wooldridge said Monday. "I'm fortunate to have those guys."

In Wooldridge's teleconference Monday, he indicated that he might travel with the Wildcats to Lubbock but didn't mention what his coaching status would be against the Red Raiders. He did say it was hard to be disconnected from the team for the past week.

"Watching the team on TV, as opposed to being in the thick of it, is a difficult thing to do," Wooldridge said. "I'd like to get out to Texas Tech. I'm playing it day-by-day. Hopefully, if I am feeling better, I can make the trip."

His wishes were granted and at 5:30 on Tuesday evening, Wooldridge boarded a separate flight down to Lubbock, putting Elgas back in his assistant coach's role for tonight's contest.

Texas Tech coach Bobby Knight said it is a sign of a good coaching program when one coach can replace another without causing confusion. That was the situation at K-State — Elgas didn't miss a beat, his players said.

"A good assistant coach fits right in the mix," Knight said. "It should be something that can carry over without any problem."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Q: What are the differences between Manhattan and Paris, France?

A: Paris is a bigger city with more people. People are much friendlier here than in Paris. Here, they come up to you, even if they don't know you. In Paris, everybody just does their own thing.

Q: Where do you want to live after you graduate in May?

A: I want to go back to Europe somewhere and play ball. I would like to go to Spain. I have been there before, and I loved it. It was a great experience.

Q: How many languages do you speak?

A: Two — French and English. I also know a little bit of Spanish.

Q: Who is your favorite player from the National Basketball Association?

A: Kevin Garnett. He's good. Growing up, I watched the NBA a lot. I was a big fan of Magic Johnson.

Q: Who do you think is the best player in the Big 12 Conference?

A: I'll go with Cartier (Martin), of course. I think he's the best because he is so versatile — he can shoot the ball, he can dribble, he can defend. I think he does a good job defensively guarding guys bigger than him.

Q: What was the last movie you saw?

A: "National Lampoon's European Vacation." It was pretty funny. I watched it with my roommate.

Q: You are wearing a Boston Red Sox hat. Are you a Red Sox fan?

A: No, that has nothing to do with it. I just like blue hats.

Q: Since you are 25 years old, do you think you have an advantage against some of your younger opponents?

A: No. I don't really care. We are still around the same age and we do the same goofy things.

Q: What do you like to do in your free time?

A: Watch movies and chill at home with my roommates. I also talk to my friends back home on the Internet, but that's about it.

Q: When was the last time you spoke with a member of your family?

A: I talked with my mom last Friday before the Missouri game. We just said hi and checked in with each other.

Road woes continue for Cats

Coach says team lacks toughness away from home

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball team has struggled to win road games this season.

Including Sunday's 74-71 loss to Missouri in Columbia, Mo., the Wildcats (13-8, 4-6) are 1-6 away from Bramlage Coliseum.

The reason?

A lack of toughness, Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"I don't think their attitude is bad — I just don't think they're tough enough," Wooldridge said Monday, five days after doctors surgically repaired a bulging disc in his neck.

"The common thread is, we haven't been good enough to win those games — probably not tough enough and just not disciplined enough or confident enough to get over the hump."

Wooldridge should know a thing or two about toughness.

Despite having difficulty talking, the sixth-year coach said he will return to the bench when the Wildcats face Texas Tech at 7 tonight in Lubbock, Texas.

Perhaps no team better understands the difficult task of winning on the road more than Texas Tech, which is 1-10 away from Lubbock.

Texas Tech (12-12, 4-6) is tied with K-State and Iowa State for seventh in the Big 12 Conference but has only lost twice at home.

However, if the Wildcats can play good defense, they have a good chance to defeat Texas Tech, senior forward Dramane Diarra said.

"We must play harder than we did (against Missouri)," Diarra said. "Defense on the road is crucial. If you play good defense on the road, you have a good chance to win games."

Defense was K-State's main problem against Missouri, which shot 51.9 percent and had 38 points in the paint against the Wildcats.

"We need to pick up our intensity and pick up our defense," Diarra said. "We did a pretty bad job on defense against Missouri. They got too many layups."

Sophomore guard Clint Stewart said Sunday's performance was somewhat embarrassing.

"I think it's just frustrating, and it is kind of embarrassing the way we've played," Stewart said. "I mean, our defense just gave up. Our defense gave up at least five or 10 uncontested dunks."

Still, K-State ranks ahead of Texas Tech in all seven team defensive statistics.

and steals (5.42) and 11th in rebounding margin (-3.5) — uncharacteristic for Bob Knight-coached teams.

Though the Red Raiders have struggled defensively, they might have one of the best backcourts in the conference, Stewart said.

"They have great guard play, so we're focusing on that," Stewart said. "We are trying to focus on our defense and get ready for higher-octane guards."

Stewart was referring to Jarrius Jackson and Martin Zeno, who each average more than 15 points.

Jackson, a 6-foot-1 junior, is the Big 12's third-leading scorer at 19.2 points per game and places one spot ahead of K-State forward Cartier Martin (18.8 points).

The last time the two squads squared off — Jan. 12, 2005 — Martin scored 14 points and grabbed five rebounds, but K-State lost 79-76 on a last-second 3-pointer by former Red Raider Curtis Marshall.

This year's matchup has more significance for both teams, Diarra said.

"We really, really need a win," he said.

Motherly leadership

Gipson working to develop consistency after loss of Wheeler

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Freshman Marlies Gipson has split personalities on and off the court.

At home she has been proclaimed as "the mom" by her three freshmen teammates.

It comes from being the oldest of five children, and she is the only female. Gipson has always had to be responsible and helps out with the chores and sets her brother's straight if they ever act up.

"They try a little bit to stand up to me, but not really too much, because I would beat them up," Gipson said. "My mom called me the enforcer for the way I would handle them."

Gipson's enforcer attitude has transferred with her to K-State.

She makes sure her fellow freshmen teammates get their homework done, and whenever they leave, they have to check in and out with Gipson to make sure everything is OK — especially roommate Danielle Zanotti.

"I get on her to do her homework, keep the room clean and have her tell me where she's going and when she will be back," Gipson said.

On the court, Gipson does not draw the attention freshman Shalee Lehning does with her spin moves and no-look passes or put up the consistent double-digit point performances her other freshman frontcourt counterpart JoAnn Hamlin does.

However, Gipson has done something none of her other teammates have accomplished this season — she has started every game for K-State. Her numbers are not outstanding. She puts up less than 10 points and 10 rebounds per game, playing a position that was nearly an automatic double-double last season when All-American Kendra Wecker occupied it.

Coach Deb Patterson knew she was not getting a player who would score double-digits night in and night out when she signed Gipson, because at McPherson High School she averaged about 10 ppg.

"I think coming in, our mindset was that we are going to get a great defender," Patterson said. "We're going to get a shot blocker, and we're going to get a very conscientious offensive player who is not akin to making a lot of mistakes, but will take some time to develop offensively."

She has been the defensive presence and rebounder Patterson thought she would be in her first year. Gipson leads the team averaging 6.1 rebounds per game, and is the team's leading shot blocker with 41, breaking the one-year old freshman shot-block record set last season by sophomore Shana Wheeler with 37.

"She can jump out of the gym, and she can pretty much do anything required of her in all aspects of the game," Lehning said. "She's just the definition of athleticism for us." But offensively she has struggled and, at times, been inconsistent.

Gipson's offensive numbers have begun to slightly increase. In the last four-of-six games, she has scored in double-digits, including a team-high 14 points on a career-high 17 field goal attempts in Saturday's 71-66 loss to Iowa State.

But within those six games, Gipson's performances, when she did not score double-digits, have been games the freshman would not want to remember.

In the overtime loss to Missouri, Gipson played in 42 minutes of the game, but only scored four points — the same number of turnovers she also had. In the same week, the Wildcats beat Nebraska in Bramlage Coliseum, but Gipson was not a big part of the win. She found herself on the bench a majority of the game.

Her stat line — nine minutes, zero points, four fouls and two turnovers against the Cornhuskers.

"I'm still searching for consistency from her," Patterson said. "I think she is more than capable at this time in the season of being a presence that other teams have to consider every catch."

While Gipson has been inconsistent at times this season, Patterson has had to stick with the freshman because they are limited at the forward position with the loss of Wheeler.

Wheeler injured her anterior cruciate ligament in the second half of the Dec. 19 game at Creighton. The safety net Patterson was working with was pulled from her, and the back-up for Gipson was gone for the year.

Any mistakes she made were now glorified, and a player without similar athleticism was not available to replace her when Gipson struggled.

"It forced her into a lot of tough situations," Patterson said. "You're either good or you're on the bench with me because you are not getting it done. If you got someone similar in athleticism, like a Shana (Wheeler), to contribute, it's not as costly. I think that has helped her to grow up, and I hope that it will help us through this stretch run to find out how important her contributions are to us every game."

In the stretch run, Gipson will find herself matched up with some of the best frontcourt players in the nation.

She will have to contend with Baylor's Sophia Young, who is the only current player named to the women's Big 12 Conference Anniversary Team, and Oklahoma freshman center Courtney Paris, who is averaging 21.5 ppg.

Gipson's vital role to her team is to keep her teammates set straight down the stretch and become the enforcer — even violent if need be just to scare them a bit.

Just like any good mother would.

Women need win against Nebraska as season comes to a close

It's test time for the women's basketball team.

K-State's young team ventures to Nebraska on Saturday for what is one of the most critical games before the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

The Wildcats are 17-6 overall, but more importantly, they are 7-5 in conference play. In the first meeting this season between the two teams, K-State was able to seize a 71-64 victory Feb. 4 in Manhattan.

K-State must be able to find a way to beat the Cornhuskers — who are sitting at 4-7 in the conference and are on a three-game losing skid — not just for pride, but out of necessity.

Let's take a look at why the upcoming Nebraska test is so important.

There are two reasons K-State must be victorious this weekend — Oklahoma and Baylor, two of the top three teams in the Big 12. Following Nebraska, K-State faces these two squads at home, back-to-back, on Feb. 21 and 25.

TEST 1

First up is Oklahoma, a team still undefeated in conference play. The Sooners are one of the best teams in the nation, ranked ninth in the most recent polls.

They also boast one of the top freshmen in the Big 12 in Courtney Paris, who recently was awarded her sixth Big 12

Rookie of the Week award.

K-State will have trouble stopping the 6-foot-4 center, who is ranked either first or second in six Big 12 statistic categories, including first in scoring (21.5 points per game), rebounding (14.8 ppg) and field goal percentage (66.2 percent).

For the Wildcats to pass the Sooner test, they need to step up and not allow easy inside shots to be made by Paris or any other Sooner.

TEST 2

K-State then must face the Baylor Bears, who are ranked third in the conference at 7-4.

The last time K-State faced Baylor was in the 2005 Big 12 Championship game in Kansas City, Mo., where the Wildcats fell to the eventual-national-champion Bears.

Baylor is working through their season behind strong play from senior forward Sophia Young who was just awarded Big 12 Player of the Week.

Coming off last year's championship season, Baylor has not played as dominant this season. However, that does not mean they will be an easy opponent for K-State.

In their last game, the Bears faced the Sooners and forced overtime. Although Oklahoma eventually won the game, the Bears are the only team to require extra time to make a decision with Oklahoma.

There is no reason the Wildcats will be absolutely unable to pull off wins against these two teams. Victory is by no means completely out of K-State's grasp, considering spurts of brilliant play have appeared.

However, K-State must pass one other test, perhaps the most important one of all.

TEST 3

The women are a great team — in the first half, but question marks still surround the second half.

But win or lose, each game shows the determination and ability of the young team Deb Patterson is fielding. For example, freshman Shalee Lehning is dominating the assists category with 70, putting her at No. 1 in the Big 12.

The final test is whether K-State can bring all the puzzle pieces together.

The talent exists, and the team is on the verge of being exceptionally good.

All they have to do now is combine that raw talent with the finesse of the historically-great teams, coupled with gut-level determination and absolute unwillingness to let a game slip through their fingers.

No one expected the team to garner the amount of success they have this season. I, for one, am elated at how well they have played and am looking forward to watching what happens next season.

However, this season is not over yet.

It is up to the women on the court to decide what they want from these final four regular-season games. Nebraska is up first and will be the best chance for a victory out of the three.

It's time to pass the test.

Cats eye NCAA tourney as season nears end

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every men's college basketball team has hopes of making the NCAA Tournament at the beginning of the season, but only 65 teams have their dreams recognized with a tournament bid at the end of the season.

K-State's (13-8 overall, 4-6 Big 12 Conference) attitude was no different at the beginning of the season. They had high expectations after winning nine of its 11 non-conference games.

Dreams have faded lately, however, because of a mediocre 4-6 conference record, which includes four losses in the last five games and losing all three away games.

The Wildcats will look right to the sinking ship today when they travel to Lubbock, Texas, to take on Texas Tech.

Coincidentally, the Red Raiders also are struggling as of late, losing five out of its last seven games, with both wins coming at home.

Coach Jim Wooldridge — who is back for the first time in a year after neck surgery — said his players might not have what it takes to make the late season push necessary for a birth in the tournament.

"Their attitudes are not bad. They're just not tough enough," Wooldridge said. "That's all I can come up with. You've just got to make a stop down the stretch or make a free throw, which gives you a better chance to win the ballgame."

ESPN college basketball analyst Joe Lunardi has a simulated NCAA Tournament bracket each week on www.espn.com, and K-State was on his list of teams making the tournament before the recent slump, but have since dropped off his board of possible participants in the season-ending tournament.

At the same time, senior forward Dramane Diarra has not given up hope and still has confidence in his team making the postseason.

"I still feel we have a chance to do it," Diarra said. "To me, we've still got six winnable games left."

"We've got everything on the line these last six games."

We need to rev it up, especially on the defensive end."

That shouldn't be a problem for the Wildcats, considering they rank fourth in the Big 12 in scoring defense, giving up only 65.3 points per game during conference play.

Defense for the rest of the season will be crucial, but sophomore guard Clint Stewart understands the next game is the most important one and overlooking teams now could end up costing K-State a victory.

"We just got to take it one day at a time," Stewart said. "The next game is the important game, and we've got to play like it's our last game of the season."

"We're in between a rock and a hard place right now, and we've got to get things fixed with our team, and hopefully things will turn around."

Do these players have what it takes to finish the season with enough victories to make the postseason?

That question will be answered shortly because March Madness is right around the corner.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN WELLNESS GUIDE

New studies suggest that alcohol consumption is a main cause of several types of cancer.

According to a Jan. 30 CNN report, researchers from the International Agency for Research on Cancer in Lyon, France, have found a strong correlation between excessive drinking and increased risk of cancer of the mouth, larynx, liver, breast and lungs.

But the research also suggests that when consumed in moderation, alcohol is said to have protective benefits against cardiovascular diseases.

No amount of alcohol consumption can be defended, said Bill Arck, director of K-State Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service.

"Alcohol cannot be recommended for physical well-being, simply because it is an induced toxin that the liver tries to flush out of our bodies," Arck said.

Most research that might suggest drinking in moderation has health benefits often is sponsored by liquor companies, Arck said.

Arck said that in rare cases where people who have a physiological predisposition to heart diseases, small doses of alcohol could help calm their nerves.

Annual surveys conducted by the Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service that about 16 percent of K-State students do not consume any form of alcohol.

Josh Cowan, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, said he consumes about two to four drinks every other week.

"I remember to never bring my car keys with me so that I don't give myself the option of driving back home," Cowan said.

Cowan also said he drinks with a group of friends and makes sure he has eaten a decent meal before drinking.

Awareness about the ill effects of heavy drinking has led students to take precautions.

DRINKING LESS, PARTYING SMART

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar | KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Before going drinking, I make sure I have food in my stomach, a ride back home and my room keys," said Linn Whitson, sophomore in pre-professional business administration.

Whitson also said she never drinks excessively, always goes out drinking with people whom she trusts, and keeps her other friends informed of her whereabouts.

The most vital things to keep in mind while drinking are the quantity and frequency of drinking, Arck said. The liver takes about one hour to flush out one alcoholic drink, which equals, one bottle of beer, one glass of wine, one wine cooler or one shot of liquor, he said.

"Some basic guidelines include drinking moderately, eating before a night of drinking, drinking with reliable people, having a designated driver who is sober, and not accepting drinks from strangers or open containers," Arck said.

Alli Mitchell, junior in social work, said she always has a designated driver when she goes to the bars on weekends.

Mitchell said she never takes her ATM card along and drinks in moderation.

"People who drink excessively tend to let their guard down and may get taken advantage of," she said. "Also, I am aware of the risks of alcohol poisoning and death."

Nick Timmons, sophomore in anthropology, said he drinks once in a while.

"I don't feel I need to drink to have a good time," Timmons said. "Whenever I do, I make sure I don't have to drive, and I go with people I know."

Hydration is important to nullify the effects of excessive liquor, Arck said. Water or fruit juices play a key role in oxidizing the alcohol and flushing it out of the liver faster, he said.

"If you learn your limits and are party smart, you'll be in control of the situation," Arck said. "Experience is the best teacher."

Protection, scalp care key to healthy hair

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College is a time when some students are broke, so hair care might be the last thing on their minds.

Wida Egan, clinic floor supervisor of Crum's Beauty College, 512 Poyntz Ave., said even if customers have a lower budget, they should still choose professional hair products.

She said advertisements have salons that are having deals and specials with products so people can save money. She said using coupons is another option. Professional products are better because the ingredients aren't as concentrated and the customer will use less, she said.

Egan said there can be certain styling aids that can help lock out pollution, humidity or smoke, but it won't completely protect the hair. Shine products or finishing sprays can create a barrier to help with protection.

She said students should pay attention to their scalp health.

"You hair is as healthy as you are internally," she said. "A multivitamin can help the hair to grow and brushing the scalp with a good bristle brush can increase the cell renewal."

She said when styling the hair it is a good idea to think about what and how much the style needs. She said she recommends having something written down from the stylist about what to use and how much.

David Yocum, owner of the American Academy of Cosmetology, 1130 Westloop Place, said the school offers student discounts to help save money.

He said he recommends looking through the ads or asking about the school's gift cards.

He said students should use professional products but should pay attention to how much they are using.

"A dime or nickel size of shampoo or conditioner is adequate for shoulder length hair and larger or smaller for longer or shorter hair," he said.

He said the hair is similar to a sponge and when students go out and are exposed to a lot of smoke or pollution, they should wash it out of their hair.

He also said taking care of the scalp is important. He said when students are unsure about the right products to use they should have a consultation with a stylist.

Danielle Fairchild, cosmetologist at Shear Dynamics Salon & Day Spa, 1125 Laramie St., said the salon is located in Aggieville so students should look at coupon books to get their hair done for a discount.

Fairchild said students should go toward using a professional product because over the counter products contain waxes, which causes build-up and strips color.

"You should pick one day out of the week where you have time to massage your scalp with shampoo for about two to three minutes," she said.

She also said students should try to get regular haircuts.

"You can wait to get a haircut, but once you get past a certain spot it is just dead hair," she said. "Haircuts will keep your hair looking healthy and looking good."

Skin care needs should be met consistently

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If students take care of themselves, some beauticians believe, beauty truly can be skin deep.

Reannon Rhodes, co-manager of Merle Norman Cosmetics Studio, 100 Manhattan Town Center, said steps should be taken to ensure healthy skin.

"One thing that is important to remember is that taking care of your skin isn't just one process," Rhodes, senior in pre-journalism and mass communications, said. "It is all about cleansing, toning and moisturizing."

Rhodes said toning the skin can help remove all the chemicals that may be left on the skin because of the water. She said every person needs moisture, so using a moisturizer will help the skin.

Rhodes said Merle Norman Cosmetics Studio sells a cleanser and toner in one that can exfoliate and will not clog pores. She said students should wash their face every morning and night to remove dirt, oil and sweat.

She recommended trying to keep the skin care regimen the same, at least for a substantial amount of time. If it is changed too often, it might cause breakouts, Rhodes said.

She said the difference between choosing the correct skin care system is similar to choosing the correct hair care regimen. Professional products are better for the skin, which is similar with hair, and will address everything for an individual's need. Merle Norman offers seven different cleansers.

"And guys shouldn't worry about using our products," she said. "My fiancé uses my regimen and they are fragrance-free, so they won't smell like a girl."

Rhodes said sunscreen is also very important for keeping the skin healthy.

"Without sunscreen you will wrinkle about twice as fast," she said. "In 40 years, they will be a lot happier."

Nadine Brazda, independent sales director for Mary Kay Cosmetics, said students should always wash their faces at night. Women should especially wash their faces at night if they wear makeup, Brazda said.

She said students should remember to cleanse their faces of dirt and oil that is acquired throughout the day. She said moisturizers are detrimental to the skin.

"It depends on when you cleanse your face, which should be every morning and night, that determines when to put moisturizer on," she said. "Your cleanser and moisturizer should be made by the same company because they are made to work together."

Brazda said students with acne should sit down with a professional and discuss individual skin-care needs.

Brazda said professional products are better for the skin since they contain the highest level of vitamins.

"Some companies don't use many vitamins. For example, if your makeup smells then that could be a sign of low vitamins," she said.

She also said she recommends an exfoliant because it will take off dead skin and can make foundation apply better.

Stephanie Riniker, aesthetician at Hair Experts Salon and Spa, 1323 Anderson Ave., said the salon offers facials which can exfoliate the skin. She said she customizes each facial to fit the customers skin type and has a consultation to address individual needs.

Riniker said she recommends choosing a professional cleanser, toner and moisturizer. These products save money in the long run since customers use less with a better quality product, she said.

Riniker said the salon offers Pevonia Botanica Skin, a skin-care system made with plants and vegetables.

"Something that I tell my clients that is very important is sunscreen," she said. "Even if you are just driving home or out for the day it is a good idea to put it on."

Tucked in a corner behind Dara's Fast Lane, the International Emporium, 611 11th St., caters primarily to five international markets.

The store, owned by Newton and Fatuma A. Ochanda, sells African, Caribbean, Middle Eastern, East Asian and Jamaican food.

"We have a geographical bent to our business," Newton Ochanda said.

Popular African items include flours and Cajun tea and coffee, Newton said. The Indian and Pakistani market centers on rice, lentils and spices, while the Middle Eastern market encompasses kosher meats and hummus.

Caribbean hot sauces, soft drinks and meats also are popular, Fatuma said.

"The drinks are very important," she said. "Some of them miss the drinks from back home."

Newton said the food sold in the International Emporium is fairly healthy. Most items do not contain much fat, and foods like fish, beans and lentils are healthy.

International Emporium customers are mostly international, Newton said, but Americans visit the store to purchase cheese, hummus, rice and olives.

"The university community is very open to trying new foodstuffs," he said.

Fatuma said she gives out recipes to customers wanting to try new dishes, and many spice bottles offer recipes as well. Priyatham Porika, system analyst with K-State's Data and Information Administration, said he is a regular customer at the International Emporium. He said the store is a good place to rent movies and buy Indian spices.

The Ochandas started the business in 2000 because Fatuma said she missed the food from her home countries of Uganda and Kenya.

She would drive to the Kansas City area to buy the food she wanted, so she said she thought there were other people in Manhattan who also missed their native foods. Fatuma said she and her husband plan to expand the business in about a year to include a café.

Students use tanning beds for varied reasons despite risks

By Holly Smith
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As spring break approaches, more students are visiting tanning salons to achieve darker skin tones despite the health risks involved.

Therese Morford, senior in athletic training and nutritional sciences, is planning a spring break trip to Key West and the Bahamas and is tanning before her trip.

"I don't usually tan, but I am going to for spring break," Morford said. "I just don't want to burn when I get there."

Debbie McCullough, owner of Hair Experts, 1323 Anderson Ave., said achieving a base tan keeps students from getting burned once they reach their destination.

"It's best to achieve a base tan in a controlled setting before going," McCullough said.

People on certain photosynthesizing medications should consider UV-free spray tans or self-tanning lotions as a safer alternative to tanning beds. These medications cause increased sensitivity to the UV rays.

"It should say on the container if it causes sensitivity to the sun," she said. "We have a whole list of these medications so if anyone has questions they can just call and ask."

It is not recommended to tan while on birth control pills, McCullough said.

Any new tanning client has to fill out and sign a consumer form. The form asks questions about skin type and medications and outlines state regulations and health hazards involved with the exposure of ultraviolet radiation.

"Everyone who tans must use protective eye wear," McCullough said. "Failure to do so could result in burning of the retina, severe burns or long-term injury."

All clients are asked if they have protective eyewear before they tan, and if they do not have any they are provided with disposable eye wear.

Hair Experts employees are trained in providing tanning services and have received their SMART Tan certification, McCullough said.

"This certification helps the employees determine the type of skin a client has," she said.

An employee recommends how long a client should tan after analyzing the skin tone.

Hair Experts has a variety of tanning beds that accommodate different skin tones. The beds range in wattage power and number of bulbs.

"We also have beds with facial bronzers," she said. "These have a lower wattage and can be turned on or off, because some people do not want to tan their face."

Austin Shepherd, junior in construction science, also is using tanning beds before going on his spring break trip to Acapulco, Mexico.

"I'm tanning because I'm going on spring break and I don't want to burn," he said.

Shepherd said he occasionally uses tanning beds other times during the year.

Emily Smith, senior in elementary education, doesn't use tanning beds because of the health hazards involved.

"I just feel like your body has to be baking on the inside," she said. "I'm just not into baking my liver, so I don't tan. It can't be any safer than being in the sun."

While many students use tanning beds to prepare for spring break, some students tan for other reasons.

Amanda Ireland, sophomore in apparel marketing, is planning on using tanning beds for her upcoming wedding.

"Usually I don't tan except when I need to de-stress," Ireland said. "But I'm getting married this summer and I want to be tan for that."

McCullough said that it's important to monitor how often a client uses a tanning bed.

"Moderation is the whole key to tanning," she said.

An employee recommends how long a client should tan after analyzing the skin tone.

Hair Experts has a variety of tanning beds that accommodate different skin tones. The beds range in wattage power and number of bulbs.

"We also have beds with facial bronzers," she said. "These have a lower wattage and can be turned on or off, because some people do not want to tan their face."

Austin Shepherd, junior in construction science, also is using tanning beds before going on his spring break trip to Acapulco, Mexico.

"I'm tanning because I'm going on spring break and I don't want to burn," he said.

Shepherd said he occasionally uses tanning beds other times during the year.

Emily Smith, senior in elementary education, doesn't use tanning beds because of the health hazards involved.

"I just feel like your body has to be baking on the inside," she said. "I'm just not into baking my liver, so I don't tan. It can't be any safer than being in the sun."

While many students use tanning beds to prepare for spring break, some students tan for other reasons.

Amanda Ireland, sophomore in apparel marketing, is planning on using tanning beds for her upcoming wedding.

"Usually I don't tan except when I need to de-stress," Ireland said. "But I'm getting married this summer and I want to be tan for that."

McCullough said that it's important to monitor how often a client uses a tanning bed.

"Moderation is the whole key to tanning," she said.

Eateries offer healthful dishes

By Sarah Hardy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students trying to form healthy eating habits might find restaurant menus challenging, but it is possible to maintain a nutritious diet by knowing which foods to pick and what characteristics to look for, according to local nutritionists.

Kelsey Lundy, personal trainer and nutrition consultant at Peters Recreation Complex, said the most important things students should look at when dining out are portion sizes and food preparation.

"The first thing you should do when you go out to eat is check and see if the restaurant offers a nutrition guide or labels for their food," said Lundy, senior in food and nutrition-exercise science. "Then you can look it over and see exactly how many grams of fat, calories, carbohydrates and protein are in the food. If you cut the restaurant serving in half, that usually qualifies as a normal portion size."

Lundy said students should eat something light at the start of a multiple course meal.

"This way, you won't over-indulge on your main meal," Lundy said.

Taco Bell, 1155 Westport Drive, offers Fresco Style tacos as a healthy eating alternative, said Binh Hoang, general manager.

"When we build Fresco Style tacos, that means we take off the cheese, sour cream, and anything else that is fattening," Hoang said. "We

■ The recommended intake level for people who are maintaining their weight is 2,000 calories a day and 65 grams of fat or less per day.

■ For those trying to lose weight, the key is to decrease food intake by a total of 500 calories a day, which would amount to a weight loss of one pound per week.

■ A recommendation for people who are trying to lose weight is to cut 250 calories worth of food from their diet, and increase activity level by 250 calories.

then replace all of that with salsa made from tomatoes, cilantro and white onions."

Mike Davis, Panera Bread Bakery general manager, said Panera Bread Bakery, 315 Southwind Place, offers low-carb bread and reduced fat cream cheese.

"If someone is looking for a healthier bagel, I would say that plain and blueberry bagels both probably have the lowest fat of out of all the bagels we carry," Davis said.

Andy Nielsen, graduate student in accounting, said he looks for taste when choosing what foods to eat.

"I don't think that restaurants have to offer healthy food," Nielsen said. "I feel that if you want to eat healthy, you can go to the grocery store and make a healthy meal at home."

Preventative baths

By Owen Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Local students and health professionals say taking a shower or bath can make one feel good, both on the outside and on the inside.

According to the Better Health Web site, many viruses can be prevented by regular bathing, such as gastroenteritis.

Gastroenteritis is commonly referred to as a stomach flu, although the virus is unrelated to influenza.

Some health problems can be avoided by usual bathing, said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center.

"Under usual healthy circumstances, a young adult can bathe daily without complications, especially if the person participated in exercise or other activity that caused perspiration," Kennedy said. "Using mild soap and warm water washes away the bacteria that can cause body odor."

Kennedy said bathing regularly helps a person's skin defend against infections.

"If a person's skin remains intact, that provides a barrier from harmful organisms entering the body and causing infection," she said. "Possibly if a person does not bathe, the organisms will accumulate."

According to the Better Health Web site, bathing habits differ with cultures. Some cultures expect a person to bathe daily, while others have different expectations.

David Rhee, sophomore in Pre-professional business administration, said he has never heard of anyone contracting a virus or disease from not bathing, but he said he has seen bathing habits of other cultures.

"When I was in China, I saw people who wouldn't bathe for months, and they were pretty sick," Rhee said. "Most people there can't afford to bathe daily, so they look sick."

Rhee said the bathrooms in Moore Hall and Delta Tau Delta are different, but both are clean.

"The bathrooms in Moore are very clean," Rhee said. "They're cleaned everyday by a custodian, and they're pretty private."

Boot Camp class provides alternatives to regular exercises

By Brandon R. Gonzalez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Recreational Services Boot Camp classes offer a different spin on exercise.

Michelle Calhoun, freshman in pre-professional elementary education, said the class is an alternative to using treadmills.

"I'd recommend it to anyone who would like a good workout and who wants to get their heart rate up," Calhoun said.

Boot Camp gives students an alternative to choreographed fitness classes, offering intense drills along with various athletic movements for men and women of all fitness levels.

Abbie Westhoff, Boot Camp instructor, said the class is ideal for those who want to get the best one-hour workout.

"In the first half of class we concentrate on cardio and in the second half muscle toning," Westhoff, junior in human ecology, said. "We do a lot of running and if you're not used to running, it can be challenging."

Jessica Larson, Boot Camp instructor, said students would find the class appealing since no two class periods are the same.

"I like to do a lot of circuit training and obstacle courses," Larson, senior in pre-nursing, said.

Larson said the goal of the class is to burn calories, build strength and increase stamina.

Some of the exercises include jumping rope, sprinting drills, jumping jacks, pushups, medicine ball crunches, squats, soccer taps, basketball drills and shuffle drills.

"Some girls may think they can't do it, but they can and at the end of class, they'll feel a sense of accomplishment," Westhoff said.

Having been through Army boot camp, Army reservist Joe Huss said the class would be a great workout experience.

Though the instructors might not yell as loud as drill sergeants, the instructors have no problem changing their voice tone to motivate class goers, Huss, junior in political science, said.

"A lot of people need the discipline and when an instructor is hard on them and tells them how it is, they'll find themselves finishing stronger," Westhoff said. "Don't doubt yourself — you can do it."

Leading parks official resigns

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ivan Wilkinson, the public address announcer for K-State football and men's basketball has stepped down, citing personal reasons as the cause of his decision.

In addition to resigning his position as announcer, Wilkinson has resigned as superintendent for the City of Manhattan Parks and Recreation.

No reason has been given for his resignation as superintendent, but the Associated Press reported the city and police are investigating "tens of thousands" of dollars missing from the recreation division of the city's Parks and Recreation Department and a possible gambling ring.

Casey Scott, associate athletics director for K-State, said Dave Louis will fill the position for the remainder of the men's basketball season, but there are no long-term plans to replace Wilkinson.

"I think that's something we'll address later, as Ivan determines the resolution of his personal issues," Scott said.

Manhattan City Manager Ron Fehr said the city did not have information on the missing funds that it could release at the time.

He also said Wilkinson's four-year tenure as superintendent was productive for the city.

"He's been instrumental in bringing in a lot of activity and recreation events to the community," Fehr said.

The city is adopting a similar stance to K-State's Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and forgoing decisions on the superintendent's position until the investigation concludes.

Wilkinson declined to comment.

Shots fired, man arrested

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man was arrested Tuesday in connection with possession of a firearm, battery, aggravated weapons violations and the criminal discharge of a firearm.

The arrest stemmed from a report of shots fired outside Finn's Pub, 317 Poyntz Ave., said Lt. Mike Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department.

Charles Edward Foster was arrested and bail was set at $30,000 after police were called to respond to the report of shots being fired outside the pub, Quintanar said. The firearm was a .380 handgun.

"One very intoxicated Charles Foster gets in an argument with his girlfriend, and she leaves. He then stepped out (of the bar)," Quintanar said.

He said no one saw the suspect fire a weapon, but witnesses said they heard a weapon go off.

Steven and Anna Kilde celebrate their 44th wedding anniversary today. Four years ago the couple wanted to celebrate their anniversary and did so by having a 7-by-16-foot mural of a medieval castle painted on their garage door.

Local couple has mural painted as symbol of anniversary

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Steven and Anna Kilde wanted to do something different for their 40th wedding anniversary — they just didn't know what.

"We didn't know what to do for our 40th — go on a cruise, throw a party or try for something really different," said Steven, who has lived in Manhattan for 23 years.

They ended up going for the "something different," and the result was the 7-by-16-foot mural of a medieval castle the Kildes had painted on their garage door. In the four years that have passed since then, the house, 2300 Wildwood Lane, has become something of a Manhattan landmark.

"It's made our street into a good landmark for giving directions," Katherine Poole, the Kildes' neighbor, said.

Poole said the painting is a good reference point when someone is looking for a restaurant or another house.

"As it was being painted, we noticed there were people who would drive by just to watch it come together," Anna said. "There were two old guys who would walk by once a week to check the progress."

Anna said a neighbor once commented that someone was going to get in an accident watching her garage instead of the road, but no accidents occurred.

The mural, which Steven said is based on the Neuschwanstein Castle in Germany, is set in a lush, green spring scene with forest-covered mountains surrounding the castle. Atop some of the castle spires are two K-State Powercat flags, a German flag, and the American flag.

Above the castle's main entrance are the words "Steven, Anna, and Kilde" as well as the date on which they were married — Feb. 16, 1962. There also sits a small white dog, in honor of the couple's bichon frise Colby, which they owned at the time.

"Most people don't know this," Steven said, "but the Neuschwanstein Castle is the one which the Disney castle is based on."

The Kildes said their idea for the mural was developed from different places, one of which was their in-laws' garage.

"Their garage is one of those that slopes down underground, so that it has two walls on each side of the entrance," he said. "One side is painted with a Kansas prairie scene, in honor of her family, and the other in a coastal scene in Maine in honor of his."

Anna said the idea for the German castle developed because she is German, and Germany is where she and Steven met, while he was serving in the military.

She said she liked Neuschwanstein Castle because it is the most famous and because of its beauty.

The Kildes said when it came to finding an artist for their mural, they turned to the K-State Department of Art.

"My wife went down to the art department and asked if they knew of anyone that could do it," Steven said. "They suggested she post a card on a bulletin board, and sure enough, we got calls about it."

The Kildes said they got offers from more than one artist, but decided on David Anthony, because, as Anna put it, "He just gave me a good feeling. I could tell he was the right one."

The couple said Anthony estimated the project would Founder's Day celebration honors historical Manhattan figures

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As K-State enters its 145th year today, the KSU Historical Society recognized the milestone with its Founder's Day celebration Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Alumni Center.

"The Historical Society's mission is to promote and present the history of K-State," Tony Crawford, university archivist, said. "We hold two programs a year, one in the spring and fall, for Founder's Day."

The event was keynoted by a presentation by Lowell Jack.

Jack authored the book "Neighbors of the Past" and a series of articles that appeared in the Manhattan Mercury. His speech focused on the historical personalities in the Manhattan area who have been associated with K-State.

"The only criteria the Mercury set for me was all the people I wrote about had to be deceased," Jack said.

A large amount of his speech focused mainly on past K-State presidents. Many of the names can be recognized as street or building names in the university and community.

These included Isaac Goodnow, who raised large quantities of money for the agricultural college, and whose house still stands at 2309 Claflin St.

Jack also spoke of Thomas E. Will, who served as K-State president from 1897-1899, and

Cheney takes blame

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Vice President Dick Cheney took the blame Wednesday for shooting a hunting companion, calling it "one of the worst days of my life," but he was defiantly unapologetic about not publicly disclosing the accident until the next day. "You can't blame anybody else," Cheney told Fox News Channel in his first public comments since the accident on a private Texas ranch Saturday.

Abu Ghraib photos

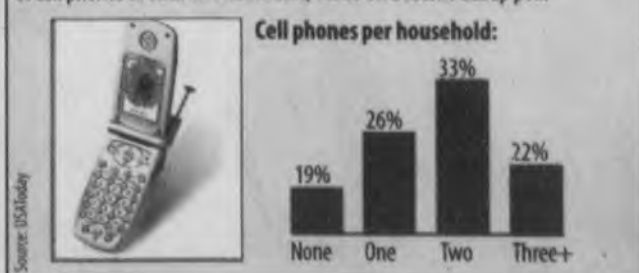

BAGHDAD, Iraq — New images showing Iraqis abused by U.S. guards at Abu Ghraib prison three years ago threatened Wednesday to enflame public anger already high over footage of British soldiers beating youth in southern Iraq. Images of naked prisoners were taken about the same time as earlier photos that triggered a worldwide scandal and led to prison sentences for lower-ranking U.S. soldiers.

Prisoner escapes

LANSING, Kan. — A prison volunteer orchestrated a carefully planned scheme to load a convicted murderer into a dog crate and help him go free, authorities said Wednesday. The inmate, John Manard, went missing Sunday from medium-security custody at Lansing Correctional Facility. A woman who ran a dog rehabilitation program there, Toby Young, is accused of driving Manard from the prison grounds.

Event promotes diversity

Jessica Galindo, junior in life sciences speaks with prospective students Haley Tieban and Emma Del Real, both of Dodge City, Kan., about K-State's Hispanic American Leadership Organization Wednesday.

Multicultural high school students visit campus

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wednesday's Multicultural Pride Day for high school juniors and seniors is aimed to recruiting minority students to K-State.

Students and their parents spent the day exploring K-State's campus and learning about college life.

In the morning, students received the latest information on financial assistance and residence halls.

Then the students broke into groups and visited with academic advisors in their major of choice or took a campus tour.

"I'm just trying to get a feel for everything," said Naka Warfield, junior at Leavenworth High School.

Campus clubs and organizations on campus that promote diversity set up booths in Bosco Student Plaza.

"We are here to promote diversity at K-State through multicultural organizations," said Kyrie Graves, sophomore in family studies and human services.

Historically black and hispanic fraternities and sororities also were represented.

"KSU is not necessarily known for diversity, and as multicultural ambassadors, we serve as a liaison to increase diversity," Naomi Moka-Moliki, junior in mass communications, said.

Lunch, entertainment and a student panel were provided in the K-State Student Union Ballroom. The entertainment was provided by Mardell Maxwell, junior in music education, who recently released a R&B album.

"Honestly, it was really great to do the show," Maxwell said. "Today was great practice for me because I will be going to New York for a talent show. It gave me a chance to perform in front of a younger crowd."

The students were involved in the entertainment portion, some giving Maxwell a standing ovation at the end of his rendition of John Legend's "Ordinary People."

"It was awesome. We kinda fell in love with the singer," said Luisa Acevedo, senior at Garden City High School.

At the end of the luncheon students asked Maxwell for autographs.

"K-State is in an ongoing approach to advance diversity. It's good to let multicultural students come and be able to hear from other multicultural students that are already here," Maxwell said.

The multicultural ambassadors gave students a chance to ask a student panel about student life.

"Typically, at our senior days, the admissions representatives have to ask most of the questions. This group actually asked their own questions; they were engaged in the panel," said Morgan Fisher admissions representative.

Students asked questions about changing majors, things to do in Manhattan and activities to get involved in.

Josh Criswell, President of the Black Student Union, junior in social science, gave the prospective K-State students, three pieces of advice. "One, learn how to study; two, bring shower shoes; and three, step outside of your comfort zone and talk to people you normally wouldn't," Criswell said.

"The main point of the student panel is for prospective minority students to learn that there are people walking around campus that look just like them," Fisher said.

The represented included Dodge City, Garden City and Leavenworth high schools," said Morgan Fisher admissions representative.

"I felt welcomed here, this day was full good information," junior at Leavenworth High School.

USD 383 becomes first district to reject new science standards

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a 6-0 final action vote, Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 became the first school district in Kansas to reject the science standards passed by the Kansas State Board of Education on Nov. 8, 2005, Mike Herman, associate professor of biology, said.

The standards allowed non-natural explanations of natural phenomena.

"I think what has us all concerned is when we look at the state standards, there is a door that opens toward Intelligent Design," board member Beth Tatarko said. "You watch presentations, you listen to the speakers, you really press them on the issue, and it is about religion."

At their Feb. 1 meeting, the board members were presented with a resolution, which was compiled and presented by faculty and professional staff of K-State science departments, that recommended this action. The resolution included the names of 157 professionals.

"There's much that can be said. In the end, I am elected on this board to do what I think is best for our students, and I thought about it long and hard," Dave Colburn, USD 383 board member, said. "The other people I had to listen to were the teachers of our school district. They've gone through a process themselves receiving the schooling, the certification, so when they say what's best for our students is to support the K-State resolution, then that goes a long way with me."

USD 383 will continue teaching science education according to the state standards developed March 9, 2005, which are consistent with all major professional science organizations in the United States, the resolution states.

This resolution was resubmitted for Wednesday's meeting and included the names of additional faculty members and graduate students. At least 14 science professionals, concerned parents and community members and students spoke in favor of accepting the resolution.

The K-State resolution stated five primary concerns: n Adoption of these standards will diminish the quality of science teaching in USD 383. n The Kansas State Board of Education standards have created enormous negative publicity, which threatens the efforts of K-State and local businesses to recruit qualified professionals.

n The standards singled out evolution for criticism, while excluding other scientific theories for such criticism.

n Concern exists that U.S. students are falling farther and farther behind in world norms.

n The changes made to science standards are based on the belief that evolutionary science is based on an atheistic philosophy.

"The recent change in the state science standards threatens the very heart of what scientific study is about: observable and testable questioning of nature," Alan Schurle, senior at Manhattan High School, said. "Offering supernatural explanations for natural phenomena would be taking an extraordinary step backward."

Schurle was recently named a semi-finalist in the Intel Science Talent Search, and he said his success is due to his excellent science education and his teachers.

"I am concerned with offering future generations the same opportunities that have been granted to me," he said.

However, not all feedback the board received was in favor of rejecting the current state standards.

"It is important to have a definition that allows legitimate scientific work and excludes work that cannot be supported by experiment and by logic," Richard Nelson, MHS science teacher, said in a letter addressed to the Board of Education. "However, under their definition, work that has not supported an evolutionary conclusion has been discouraged or disregarded, not because it lacked scientific quality, but because it had religious implications other than evolutionary thought."

Another concern was that disregarding state standards could give students a misconception of how democratic societies should function.

"The KSU faculty has proposed that the school board disregard the rulings of elected officials," Joyce Nelson, parent of three USD 383 students, said in a letter. "Apparently, they feel it is acceptable to pick and choose which laws/rulings the school board should abide by. Is this the message we want to communicate to our children and teachers?"

TO THE POINT Landlords should not capitalize on soldier influx

In the next couple of years Manhattan will see an influx of residents, mainly soldiers and their families coming to Fort Riley.

Many new apartment complexes and homes are being built to accommodate the increase in town. Since there is such a demand for housing, several property managers are raising rent for next year's tenants. One resident said his rent will increase as much as $80 per month. This same resident said he has lived in the home for three years, and next year will be the first time his rent has gone up.

Common sense economics tells us that the cost of living goes up every year, along with inflation, but that does not mean landlords should capitalize on students and soldiers by hiking up housing costs above what is necessary.

It is understandable for property managers to up the rent for new tenants, but for the loyal tenants that are re-signing leases, managers should have some sympathy.

If landowners decide to raise rent, they should make sure to clearly communicate this with residents and give them ample time to decide whether to re-sign their leases.

While communication and patience have always been vital between tenants and landowners, it is that much more important now that our town is to gain such an increase in residents.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Educated voter

Columnist gives insight into SGA elections, warns of promises

Two years ago, the number three was significant to the K-State student body. No, it wasn't the number of games the football team won or even total number of calls an average K-State student makes to the Fourum. It was the number that elected Hayley Urkevich as student body president and denied Vicki Conner office.

By Friday, more than one hundred students will have filed to compete for coveted offices in Student Governing Association. And come Monday, these students will plaster the campus with campaign posters and sidewalk chalkings.

Prepare to be annoyed. Every year, it's the same jazz. One pair of candidates says they will add parking lots all over campus. Another pair promises to reduce the price of textbooks or tuition.

All these campaign promises are like those of a bad relationship. Don't trust a word any of these people say. The promises are plentiful but often are empty.

Trust me. When I campaigned for Student Senate, I thought the body voted on groundbreaking issues for K-State. Hidden under my scandalous "a great body wanting to get into your student body" slogan were issues, real issues that I wanted to address for the university. I wanted to push for a freshman mentor program and diversity education, considering nearly one-third of the student body fits into both categories.

But I'll admit, I liked the fact that I could say I was one of the elite senators on campus. I sold my soul to the student body just for a position that, in the end, heavily disappointed me.

For those of you who have never attended a Senate meeting, you might want to consider doing so.

The body is in charge of millions of dollars in student privilege fees and has the power to increase those fees for glamorous features on campus like the Bosco Clock Tower, the highlight of my Senate term.

I'm sure that within the next couple weeks, you will get to know one candidate running for office, whether he is running for Senate or for student body president. Regardless of the changes the person will bring to the university, you, the voter, should demand more.

After all, it's your attention he or she wants most.

Ask the candidates what they really plan to bring to K-State.

Most candidates, honestly, on any level, lack legitimate power to bring any significant change to SGA. Candidates make like they are the panacea to the university's problems.

I mean, honestly, do you really think one or two people can save you hundreds in tuition or get you a better quality education?

Regardless, it'd be nice to learn what they can really bring to the table, considering most candidates want to fill these offices for superficial reasons, like building their résumé.

As I reflect on my experience in Senate, I believe above all things, voters cannot elect a bad student representative. Most candidates have powerful experiences and seductive personalities.

Anybody can successfully fill these SGA offices up for grabs. I did. Most offices require these representatives to attend meetings once or twice a week. Some offices, like student body president and vice president, are little more demanding, but with the stipends we give them, they'll manage.

When it boils down to whom you vote for, there is no bad choice. In 2004, I believe Conner learned that harsh reality, as she took a secondary role as senator instead of student body president. I know that to her, three is an extremely powerful number, carrying a lifelong lesson. You can never work too hard for something you want.

Three votes, however, is rather insignificant compared to the thousands cast in elections that year. The worst part is knowing that between these women, both of them would have handled the duties of the office just fine.

For some candidates, all they can really offer is a catchy slogan and unobtainable goals. Urkevich and Conner challenged that. And with the new set of candidates this election, maybe they will bring something more to the table. Instead of worrying about which candidate to vote for this year, however, voters need to focus on the real issues for these offices: what these people can truly offer you.

Kansans should be proud of their heritage

I love Kansas. I really do. But if I hear one more person tell me, "There's no place like home," they might just have another Civil War on their hands.

If you're anything like me, born and bred in the heartland, a part of you knows, deep down, you really love Kansas. You secretly know all the words to "Home on the Range," and love the sight of wheat blowing in the wind.

But let's get real. It doesn't matter where you are, when people hear you're from Kansas, they ask if you know Dorothy and have a dog named Toto.

The national population must not know much about geography, which is reiterated when someone asks me where Kansas is.

My parents just moved to Virginia, and my mom started a job at a local school. When the students heard she was from Kansas, one little girl asked, "Where in the world is Kansas?"

Why is it so hard to remember there's a big block of land in the middle of the country?

For crying in a bucket, our country is not shaped like a doughnut. There's something in the middle, and it's not cream filling. Kansas has gotten the smack-down on every topic under the sun, from our educational system to political views. It's time to be honest with ourselves. Our state is suffering from emotional trauma. The only solution is the annexation of the state of Kansas from the union.

The Republic of Kansas. We might need to work on our country's name a bit. Maybe spice it up and add a few more syllables and hyphens.

As enticing as this might sound, I know what you are all thinking.

Will we have to pay exorbitant fees for mailing packages to Nebraska or learn a new national anthem?

Most importantly, whose face will get to be on the new $1 bill?

Personally, I think we should have a moat around our country with alligators swimming around in it. We'll have a massive wall around the state line with barbed wire and some medieval-looking drawbridges.

I regret to inform out-of-state students they will now be considered international students.

Luckily, you won't have to learn a new language, but you might be administered a test to ensure you know the difference between corn and maize.

Okay, so an annexation might be a little extreme. We might not be able to keep ourselves afloat for long, especially after importing a bunch of bananas costs us an arm and a leg.

But let's not be last in the pecking order. I know separating ourselves from the rest of the country might be a bit much, but maybe we could try being proud of our state.

Look at what you have to brag about.

Some of the most influential people in U.S. history were from Kansas, including pilot Amelia Earhart, silent comedian Buster Keaton and former President Dwight D. Eisenhower (technically born in Texas, but we still count him).

Did you know the first Pizza Hut was opened in Wichita or that Sumner County is the wheat capital of the world?

We also have a freakishly huge ball of twine in Cawker City and a grain elevator half a mile long in Hutchinson.

So brush up on your fourth grade Kansas history and be proud of where you come from.

I find it ironic that the Collegian prints a guide on making various mixed drinks on the second page of the paper and then makes another whole section advising us to drink and party less.

Is it incest to run with your brother or sister? Or is it just normal?

Do we really want two politicians, I mean political science teachers, looking over the student body?

Gigstad, Durand plan to eliminate Friday classes for study

Nick Durand, left, sophomore in construction science, and Chris Gigstad, junior in political science, announce their candidacy for student body vice president and president, respectively. As a part of their platform, they will try to get rid of Friday classes, improve parking and expand the Peters Recreational Complex.

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chris Gigstad and Nick Durand want to do away with Friday classes.

They are not trying to extend the weekend so students can sleep in or party. These candidates for student body president and vice president, respectively, said they want to give students more time for assignments and studying. Teachers could be more available to students with open office hours on Fridays, they said.

"We really want to improve communication with students and teachers," Gigstad, junior in political science, said. "There may be some students that have trouble understanding their teachers, especially if they don't speak English very well. We want to change that."

Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday classes would be 75 minutes long to meet the required number of hours.

The two, both members of Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity, have several other items on their platform, including updating classrooms, expanding the Peters Recreation Complex, improving parking and increasing student-body unity.

"I've walked into some classrooms where you are lucky to get a projector," Gigstad said. "Everytime you go into the Rec (Complex) this time of year, you can't get on any machine, and we would like to take a good look at parking."

"We have a lot of ideas," Durand, sophomore in construction science, said. "We have always wanted to get involved and make the necessary changes to our university."

Gigstad is an intern at the State Capitol and wants to make politics a career. Durand, TKE's treasurer, and rush and social chairman. They said they want to hear students' opinions.

Gigstad said he and Durand connect with people and want to hear from the entire university, not just the Greek community.

Gigstad said he is not necessarily in favor of making classes bigger but would like to make enrollment easier so students can take the classes they need to graduate.

"We would like to see the students get together more often and really see unity outside cheering on our school at sporting events," he said. "I think we can bring together the student body and become a more cohesive university."

Hauser, Boatman look to improve quality of education

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuition, communication and progress is the mantra for Zach Hauser and Erica Boatman.

Hauser, senior in political science, and Boatman, sophomore in apparel marketing and design, filed Wednesday for president and vice president of the student body.

Hauser and Boatman said they want to provide higher quality education for students.

"A lot of students don't feel they get a lot from their classes sometimes," Hauser said.

"A way we think we can combat that is to work together with faculty to almost bring a graduate-level course experience to the undergraduates."

Boatman said she thinks this structure will help students gain a more effective educational experience.

"They will actually learn and retain more information," Boatman said.

This proposed change would allow students to achieve a better education for the same price they already are paying, Hauser said.

"We think this is a better approach than just saying, 'hey, tuition is important to us and we will keep it as low as possible,'" Hauser said. "This way, you will get quality for the money you put down."

Hauser and Boatman said they want to provide the student body with Feedback Fridays.

"This is dedicating an hour and a half to two hours a week where we will be available to talk with students one-on-one and say, 'here is what we are working on this week for you,'" Hauser said. "And then ask, 'how can we serve you better?'"

Boatman said Feedback Fridays will provide accountability and a communication channel students can use.

"This shows that we are approachable," Boatman said. "You hear so much from candidates when they are campaigning, but once they win you don't really hear back from them. We want to provide that to the student body so they can actually be aware we are helping."

Hauser and Boatman said creativity sets them apart from other candidates.

"It's not just about the issues," Hauser said. "It's about finding creative solutions to the same issues and I think that's what we really have here. That's what we think separates us from other candidates."

Erica Boatman, left, sophomore in apparel marketing, and Zach Hauser, senior in political science, announce their candidacy for student body vice president and president, respectively. The two will work to increase communication and progress.

Team still has high potential

The K-State men's basketball team will attempt to make a run for the NCAA Tournament here in the final weeks of the regular season.

The chances of that happening are about slim to none, and slim might be leaving town shortly.

I once wrote about how I think this team has the potential and the talent to be an NCAA Tournament team, and I will stand here today and say I still believe it has what it takes to be a tournament team.

The Wildcats have all the right characteristics but lately have been lacking something that has led to their losing four out of their last five games.

Coach Jim Wooldridge, who returned Wednesday after a weeklong absence because of neck surgery, said his team has the right attitude going into each game, but believes it lacks something else.

"Their attitudes are not bad. They're just not tough enough," Wooldridge said. "That's all I can come up with. You've just got to make a stop down the stretch or make a free throw — that gives you a better chance to win the ball game."

And lately, K-State has not been able to hit the shots necessary to pull out close victories.

Junior Cartier Martin had a chance to beat Missouri on Sunday with time running out. He got the ball with less than five seconds to play and K-State down, 73-71, but missed a three-point attempt at the buzzer to hand the Tigers the victory.

This is just one example of the team's inability to finish close games, and I don't have enough time to give every single example.

Now don't get me wrong — I am and have been on this team's bandwagon the whole season, but time is running out for the Wildcats to earn a bid in the NCAA Tournament.

The Wildcats have an extremely tough schedule down the stretch, and if they can somehow turn the table, they just might sneak into the tournament.

K-State has home games against No. 6 Texas and No. 22 Kansas and an away game against No. 19 Oklahoma remaining on the schedule.

Now, it is highly unlikely the Cats will upset all three of these teams, but again, I will tell you they have the talent and potential to do exactly that.

The only other option for the Wildcats to make the tournament would be to pick up the automatic bid awarded to each conference champion.

K-State would automatically qualify for the NCAA Tournament if it wins the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

Again, this is highly unlikely because there are some tough teams in this conference and some that are just downright better than K-State.

But I have seen stranger things happen.

So, until I am 100 percent sure K-State is out of the tournament race, I will continue rooting for these guys because I still believe in them, as should all K-State fans.

If it's any consolation, I doubt the Wildcats will get snubbed from the National Invitational Tournament two years in a row, but we'll see.

K-State baseball starts season with invitational in Texas

By K. Jordan Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 2005 baseball season for K-State was one marked with success, as it topped 30 wins for the third time in the last 14 years, including a victory against No. 1 Texas — the 2005 national champion.

Today, the K-State baseball team will open its 2006 season, as the Cats head to the home of President George W. Bush and play a three-game set in the annual University of Texas-Arlington Invitational.

The four teams invited are the Wildcats, Oral Roberts, Illinois State and hosts the Texas-Arlington Mavericks. K-State is the only one of the quartet opening its season this weekend. The other three teams already have opened competition.

Texas-Arlington is the first team the Wildcats will face in their 2006 campaign. The Mavericks don't have a returnee hitting above .300, but Oral Roberts — K-State's Friday opponent — arguably will be K-State's fiercest competitor this weekend, boasting a roster with four starters who are hitting above .400.

Illinois State, the Wildcats' Saturday competition, finished with a sub-.500 record last year at 26-27.

Still, K-State coach Brad Hill isn't taking Illinois State lightly.

"We're not going to change our game," Hill said. "We're gonna go out there and attack their hitters, throw strikes and

Looking back on 2005

■ The Wildcats finished the season at 30-25 (8-19 Big 12 Conference). K-State topped 30 wins for the third time in 14 years.

■ They beat No. 1 Texas, the 2005 national champion, marking K-State's first-ever win against a top-ranked team.

■ Former players Steven Murphy and Terry Blunt were named to All-Big 12 Conference team.

play hard."

This is K-State's first game out, and Hill said he thinks the advantage might lie in the weather, as the Wildcats have had close to 15 practices outside, rather than in a gym.

Physical mistakes because of the cold are tolerable, but mental ones are not as excusable, Hill said.

"I want to see us develop and execute as a team," he said. "We need to play good D (defense), not walk guys, manufacture runs and hopefully on Sunday, we'll be better than we were on Friday."

Hill said the only way to do these things is through game experience, game play and talking through mistakes. With experience on the bump, he said, this is a goal that can be achieved.

The Wildcats have eight pitchers and four of the top-six hitters returning from last season, not to mention 16 promising freshmen and two redshirts.

Sophomore Brad Hutt, senior Adam Cowart and sophomore Chase Bayuk will start games one, two and three. All three have Big 12 Conference experience, and all three will be on a pitch count, which means the bullpen — like most doctors — will be on call.

Bolstered by seniors BJ Kissel and Bryan Peterson, who have experience pitching late in big games, Hill is comforted by his relievers and is confident they'll execute when called upon, he said.

Hill isn't the only one backing the squad and ready to go.

Sophomore Dan Edwards, a right-handed pitcher, knows the three starters are ready for action and, as a reliever himself, is mentally prepared.

"We go through all kinds of mental and physical drills during the fall to help prepare us for late-game situations. We go over every situation that could happen in a game every day in practice," Edwards said. "So there is no situation that would be new to us."

While some players fear the unanticipated, sophomore catcher Derek Bunker seems unabashed with pre-game jitters.

"We are looking forward to going out and showing everyone else what this team is capable of doing this season," Bunker said. "We have a good mix of starters back from last season and good young guys on the squad, and we are just really excited to go out and get this thing rolling."

The Texas-Arlington Invitational was scheduled to begin Friday and end Sunday, but due to the threat of cold and rainy weather, the dates have been revised.

Loss all but dashes NCAA bid hopes

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State and Texas Tech were tied for seventh in the Big 12 Conference entering Wednesday night's game. The line on the contest was two points.

But the game's final score was not even close, as the Red Raiders (13-12, 5-6 Big 12 Conference) dropped K-State 70-56, handing the Cats (13-9, 4-7) their worst loss of the season and moving them to an eighth-place league tie with Missouri.

The defeat makes K-State 1-5 in its last six outings and pushes the Wildcats' road record to 1-6, virtually eliminating K-State's hopes of an NCAA Tournament bid.

Coach Jim Wooldridge was on the sidelines for the first time in a week, after having surgery on his neck to remove a bulging disc, but his presence couldn't provide a spark for the Wildcats, who gave Texas Tech its first win in three games.

Juniors Cartier Martin and Lance Harris scored 15 points each, but the rest of the team's inability to score and 21-of-60 shooting (35 percent) on the game interfered with the tandem's efforts.

Texas Tech had four players in double-digits, including the backcourt combination of Jarrius Jackson (15) and Martin Zeno (11). Jonathan Pfluka tallied a career-high 16 points, and Alan Voskuil also notched a career-high 15, all of which came from 3-pointers.

The inability to score and 17 turnovers were the main reasons K-State was not able to maintain the lead. The Wildcats had a 9-7 advantage in the first half but an eight-minute drought, poor passing and defense, and 9-of-30 shooting from the field allowed the Red Raiders to go on a 14-0 run, establishing a 21-9 lead.

score, closing out the first half with a 34-20 lead.

The second half was no different. The Red Raiders stretched a 14-point lead to 20 at 15:33, when they went ahead 24-44. The Red Raiders' largest lead came at 5:30, when they pushed their edge to 62-36.

Harris sparked a 15-2 run with three minutes left in the game by hitting two straight 3-pointers, but it was not enough.

luge team crashes

CESANA, Italy — The top American doubles luge team of Mark Grimmette and Brian Martin was disqualified after crashing during their opening run Wednesday, eliminating any chance they had of winning a third Olympic medal.

They slid for several seconds, but both were able to walk away apparently uninjured. Both were clearly distraught and disappointed afterward, with Grimmette interrupting himself twice while talking with reporters because he was unable to keep his emotions in check.

Shortly after Grimmette and Martin crashed, the Ukrainian team of Oleg Zherebetsky and Roman Yavinsky were involved in a frightening accident near the finish line. The Ukrainians smashed into the upper wall of the track and then flipped, with the front right runner of their sled breaking off and flying away when they hit with the ice.

also express surprise

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Missouri's chancellor and a member of the Board of Curators have joined the school president in expressing surprise about the timing of basketball coach Quin Snyder's resignation.

Snyder, in his first public comments since stepping down last week, said Tuesday night that he quit after a member of the athletic department dispatched by athletic director Mike Alden told him his contract would be terminated after the season and that all of the school's top administrators were in agreement.

Chancellor Brady Deaton, who is heading an internal investigation into the handling of Snyder's departure, said Wednesday in a statement that he had been "surprised" to learn of Snyder's resignation last Friday.

Curator Don Walsworth also issued a statement Tuesday saying he "never advocated" having Snyder resign before the end of the season. Walsworth said discussion had emphasized evaluating the coach's performance after the season was over.

power emerges in Ohio

CINCINNATI — Three years after LeBron James led his high school to prominence before taking his breathtaking game to the NBA, Ohio has another national prep basketball power.

No. 2 North College Hill High School has gone unbeaten this season, despite a schedule loaded with top teams from Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia and California. The team features O.J. Mayo and Bill Walker, widely considered among the best two or three players in the nation's high school junior class.

On Saturday night, it faces perennial power No. 1 Oak Hill Academy of Virginia at U.S. Bank Arena, with a sellout crowd of about 16,500 expected.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art is the first venue to host "Something to Look Forward To: Featuring Abstract Art by 22 Distinguished Americans of African Descent" and will showcase work from a past generation of black artists.

"Something to Look Forward To" pays homage to the talent, vision and persistence of particular black artists who have created dynamic abstract images and objects during extended and successful careers," Martha Scott, administrative officer for the museum, said.

A Pennsylvania museum invited 22 black artists, 60 years and older, to participate in a traveling exhibition. Each artist displays two works, created six to 10 years apart, Scott said.

Bill Hutson, distinguished artist-in-residence at Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster, Pa., and curator for the exhibit, said the show aims to bring together abstract artists in order to show that there is a black aesthetic to abstract art.

Hutson said the building blocks to the show include style, identity and age. The exhibit is a tribute to honor the endurance of mature artists, he said.

"Like aging athletes, older contemporary artists are expected to throw in the towel," Hutson said. "As we advance into a new millennium, more individuals are living longer, staying active and enjoying a better quality of life than human beings realized during previous centuries."

The exhibit submissions cover several forms of abstract art, including painting, sculpture, furniture and multimedia.

Among the featured artists is Lawrence Compton Kolawole. "Chair" and "Bed" are two pieces created in 1973 and made of blue tempera and wood, according to the pieces' descriptions. They are regal, ceremonial furnishings covered with black and gold leaf symbols that were devised with German linguist and philosopher Gisela Frankenberg, the description said.

Such a large assortment of works in a variety of styles and dimensions can seem like a daunting task to those in charge of securing and setting up the exhibit, said Suzanne Hale, registrar-collections manager for the museum.

"It is not a large show in terms of the number of pieces, but particular objects are large and heavy," Hale said. "The exhibition designer did a great job with set-up."

The show arrived in more than 30 crates — most shows arrive in a small number of crates with numerous works from multiple artists in each crate — each containing one or two pieces of art. The works were sent directly from the individual artists, Hale said.

"While we were setting up, we were a little crowded in the gallery and storage area," she said.

Hutson assembled the show, including research and artist information, and it was not necessary for the museum to complete background work.

"It's nice to have a packaged show. It makes things much simpler, especially with the museum's expansion," Hale said.

The museum is the first venue to display "Something to Look Forward To," which will travel to various museums and exhibit halls across the country, Hale said. "It is very exciting to be the first location to hold this show," she said.

The show will continue until April 2. The museum is open 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesdays through Fridays and 1-5 p.m. Saturdays and Sundays.

Cruise, Holmes deny breakup report

LOS ANGELES — Hollywood lovebirds Tom Cruise and Katie Holmes remain engaged to be married, his publicist said on Tuesday, denying a Valentine's Day report to the contrary.

"It should be known that the story (of a breakup) is 100 percent false," spokesman Paul Bloch said in a statement sent to news agencies in response to the report, from celebrity magazine Life & Style.

"Mr. Cruise and Ms. Holmes are still engaged and are moving forward with their wedding plans, as well as planning for the arrival of their child. Despite the malicious fallacies put forth ... the couple is looking forward to a long and happy life together as a family."

Twice-married Cruise, 43, and Holmes, 27, began dating in April, but far from keeping their relationship low-key, the "Mission: Impossible" star publicly declared his passion for his new girlfriend in a manic, couch-jumping appearance on "The Oprah Winfrey Show."

Searches on Facebook simplify stalking

I'm interested in a guy, so I searched for him on the Facebook (to do some friendly research), and on his wall all of the comments are from different girls. Does this mean he's a player?

LAUREN ROHRER

"Friendly research" my foot. The Facebook has made stalking simple for us for about two years now.

It's cool. We've all had our own questionable motives for using the site.

Personally, I think there's trouble. If he's got that many female distractions now, who's to say he won't if you ever get together?

Try to find a guy who's only distracted by you. Until then, happy stalking.

I think I might be in love with my best guy friend. He told me that he only thinks of me as a friend. Does that mean there's still some hope, or should I just forget about it?

If that's what he said, it is most likely what he means. The older I get, the more I realize guys aren't as complicated as we would like them to be.

If you really feel that strongly for him, then I am truly sorry. But honestly, the worst thing you can do is try to make the relationship something it is not.

My girlfriend really doesn't like to party, but I do. How can I include her in my weekends?

That's really cool that you're trying. Most guys would say 'screw it' and crack open another.

Have you thought about alternating? Try staying in every other weekend.

If you're willing to compromise for her, more than likely she'll do the same for you.

If not, maybe it is time to crack open another.

I already am behind in my homework, and it's the sixth week of classes. I'm lacking the motivation to keep up on my readings. What can I do to keep on the ball?

For me, being on academic probation is pretty damn motivating. But as a veteran Manhattan party girl, I can relate.

If it's hard to think in terms of textbooks, try to think in terms of dollars.

College is one of the biggest financial commitments you will ever make.

Compare the money spent to something a little less abstract: For example, if I spend $229 on an iPod, I am going to use it to the fullest extent.

You spend thousands on your education, so use it to it's fullest.

That might mean getting a tutor, going to extra labs or (horror of horrors) staying in on a Thursday night.

Panel discusses evolution theory

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A panel of high school teachers and professors discussed evolution Wednesday afternoon in Fiedler Auditorium.

The conference, titled "Evolution: Facts and Fantasies," was sponsored by Sigma Xi and featured a panel of speakers that included teachers from Olathe East High School and Liberty, Mo., High School.

Professors from K-State's biology, entomology and geology departments also were featured.

Speaking on the topic of scientific literacy, David Rintoul, associate professor of biology, said misinformation from both the Christian right and the delegitimization of scientific methods in favor of other ways of knowing, are major deterrents to the teaching of evolution.

A large number of people in the United States believe dinosaurs existed at the same time humans did, Rintoul said.

"A majority of the country believes Fred and Wilma Flintstone are real," he said.

Postmodernism plays into the hands of Intelligent Design and Creationists, with the post-modernist belief that scientific methods should be abandoned in favor of other methods of knowing, Rintoul said.

This legitimizes the belief of Intelligent Design theorists that they should be given equal time in the science classroom, he said.

The common statement that evolution is only a theory might be true, Rintoul said, but it draws more debate than other theories, such as cell theory and germ theory.

"We've got theories out the wazoo," Rintoul said.

Evolution is the study of the origin of species and not the origin of life, Rintoul said.

The panel answered questions from both the audience and the moderator, Keith Miller, research assistant professor of geology.

The panel consisted of Rintoul, Brad Williamson, master teacher of biology at Olathe East High School; Albert Frisby, master teacher of biology at Liberty High School; Srinivas Kambhampati, professor of entomology, and Larry Scharmann, professor and chair of secondary education.

Frisby answered one question about the greatest challenge to the teaching of evolution in public schools.

"I've had students actually get up out of the classroom and walk out," he said.

The biggest challenge in teaching at Olathe East is maintaining religious neutrality, Williamson said.

When asked by Miller about the need to learn evolution, several panelists said evolution applies to current events as well as health-care needs.

With the avian flu outbreak, there are concerns the virus will mutate and exchange genes with the human flu, Kambhampati said.

If a doctor prescribes antibiotics for 10 days and a person only takes the medicine for seven days, it can create problems, Scharmann said.

Bands bring music, military pageantry

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Black Watch and the Band of the Welsh Guard will perform at 8 p.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium as part of a six-month tour in the United States.

Thomas Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain, said this performance will be different from the shows normally featured.

"Typically, The Black Watch performs in parade grounds and large fields," he said. "To have them do what they do in an auditorium is very different."

Jackson said The Black Watch and the Band of the Welsh Guard are two separate military branches of the United Kingdom that work together to deliver the performance.

"There will be a great deal of military pageantry," he said. "They will be doing traditional Welsh folk dancing, as well as that of Scotland and England."

The Band of the Welsh Guard is made up of the rare combination of percussion, bagpipes and horns, Jackson said.

"Typically, you can see orchestras, quintets or quartets, but you never see a performing group of this nature with bagpipes and horns," he said. "I'm excited because it is so unique."

According to The Black Watch's Web site, the group's U.S. tour began Jan. 11 and includes 52 performances in 25 States, as well as one in Canada. It listed Manhattan as the only stop in Kansas.

Preceding the performance will be an informational lecture by Gary

The lecture begins at 7 p.m. Friday in McCain 204. It is free of charge and open to the public.

Mortenson said he will speak about his knowledge of the group and his personal experiences in London.

"I spent 10 days in London two years ago, and I interviewed another of the Queen's guards, the Irish Guards," he said. "I will be talking about my knowledge of what military bands do, and the services they render in and around London."

In addition, Mortenson said he also will play some examples of military music written over the past century.

Jackson said this performance is important for students to see because it is something they might never see again in their lifetime.

"This group is quite a spectacle because they're so unique," he said. "That's our major objective here at McCain — to give students a wide variety of art foras from many parts of the world. We're fortunate we can have The Black Watch and the Band of the Welsh Guard in the greater Manhattan community."

Rents rise in Manhattan as demand increases

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several Manhattan property managers have decided to raise the rent on their housing.

The price increases might be because of Fort Riley soldiers returning to the community, Larry Hackney, human resources specialist for Manhattan, said.

"It is possible that in recent years Manhattan has begun to develop a lower rent rate because of new rentals being built," Hackney said. "But that's all changing with the influx of soldiers at Fort Riley, turning it around and making more of a demand."

Hackney said he does not remember a general increase in rent in Manhattan in previous years.

"Cost of living is something that routinely has an upward trend, but I don't remember any specific thing driving rental housing cost up in Manhattan in previous years," he said.

Moreen Morgan, property manager for Diamond Real Estate Management, said Diamond Real Estate is raising its rent for next year.

"We are raising rent ranging from $5 an apartment to $50 an apartment," Morgan said. "It averages out to be less than 5 percent."

The adjustments are made based on market research and the location and condition of the housing, Morgan said.

"If the house isn't in a very good location, we probably won't raise the price as much," she said.

Garrett James, sophomore in music, said he made the decision to move out of his apartment largely because of high rent. James lives in a one-bedroom apartment and recently found out if he renewed his lease, his rent would increase by $50 a month.

"The rent was already ridiculously expensive," he said.

Grant Thiessen, junior in social science, said his rent also is going up. Thiessen lives in a six-bedroom house, and the rent is going up $80 a month.

"We have lived there three years, and this is the first year it's gone up," Thiessen said. "I don't plan on moving out because of it, though."

Lucille Jelinek, owner of Crum's Beauty College, said she is not raising the rent prices on the townhouses she owns and lets.

"We think rent is high enough now," she said. "I'm happy with what I'm getting already."

Jelinek said several Fort Riley soldiers have contacted her for housing.

"Lots of Fort Riley soldiers have been calling in wanting a place and say they have been having trouble finding anything cheap enough," she said. "All these big, new buildings were made with the builders thinking they would make money off these soldiers, but these soldiers don't have enough money to pay for that high rent."

Jelinek said she sympathizes with many students who have a tight money situation while attending school.

"These students have a hard enough time trying to get money for rent," she said, "and I don't want to take advantage of students. They are just already so hard up for money."

Hackney said he doesn't know how long students can expect to see an increase in rent.

"It could be a one-time phenomenon that has a long duration," Hackney said. "But buildup at Fort Riley is supposed to continue, so we might see an upward pressure on housing costs for a period of time."

CASTLE | Manhattan couple's garage-door mural painted by K-State art student

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

The castle on the Kildes' garage door is based on Germany's Neuschwanstein Castle, which also is the basis for the Disney castle.

take about three weeks, but because of technical difficulties with the paint, it took about six.

Steve laughed when he recalled how Anthony, a former engineering student, went about starting the mural.

"We told him he didn't have to make it look exactly like it (Neuschwanstein Castle), just kind of like it," he said. "But he went straight off to the library to look it up in books."

The Kildes said Anthony first sketched the castle on onion skin paper and then used an overhead projector to trace the outlines and details on the door and to make sure it was centered and correctly sized.

The mural, which Anthony began in late April, was finished at about the end of May, Anna said.

"The mural has lasted well these last four years," Steve said. "The paint still looks pretty good."

The Kildes said the biggest changes it has brought into their lives is they're now introduced — in Manhattan at least — as "the people with the castle house."

"People also use our house to give directions all the time," Anna laughed. "But I don't blame them. It is hard to miss."

Anna said one of their favorite memories of the mural involved a love-struck K-State student.

"He must have been 19 or 20, and he just knocked on our door one day," Anna said. "He said his three-month anniversary with his girlfriend was coming up, and he asked if he could set up a picnic in front of our garage."

Steven said he remembered being impressed with the young man's idea.

"Oh, he told us all about it. He wanted to set up a table for two, right in front of our castle and then have a candle-lit dinner — I don't know if he was going to make it, maybe they were going to have pizza or something," Steven said.

The castle-side picnic never ended up taking place, though, Anna said, because of bad weather conditions.

Upon entering castle house, visitors find themselves surrounded by hundreds of different knick-knacks and antiques, many of which are of German origin. The Kildes said they love to collect, but they don't go off in search of specific items.

"If we like it, we buy it," Anna said. "And if we buy it, it's ending up somewhere in the house."

The couple said the number of items they've accumulated over the years has become something their children tease them about, but they don't mind.

Some items displayed in the couple's living room include a collection of old-style German beer tankards, one of which dates from the 1730s.

Something else one might notice after spending a few minutes at the Kildes' is the number of small clay garden gnomes that peek out from the walls and corners of different rooms.

"I think Steven discovered he really liked them during a trip to Germany," Anna said. "They're all over the place now."

In almost perfect fairy tale fashion, Steven and Anna Kildes were named the 2006 Prince and Princess of the German-American Club of Topeka, of which they are members.

"It is like a fairy tale," Anna said. "We have our castle, and now we have our crowns."

borrow $5,500. Graduate students also will see increased borrowing eligibility.

Additionally, parents who take out loans on behalf of their children will see interest rates increase from 7.9 percent to 8.5 percent, Moeder said.

He said the changes made by the Deficit Reduction Act will affect students as they consolidate loans after graduation because they will have to consolidate at a higher rate.

"When they go into repayment, it will cost them additional money in interest," he said.

Michael Oldfather, associate professor of economics, said the rate increase might have some negative effects on university enrollment.

"It's a pretty substantial increase," he said. "It'll make a difference in the size of a person's payment."

"You'd expect that it'd crowd out some people."

Oldfather said the increase might cause some students to leave college or to take fewer hours each semester and, thus, take longer to graduate.

Moeder, however, said he does not see the rate increase as prohibitive.

"I don't believe our students will be prevented from attending K-State because of the change," he said.

was the only president to have nothing at the university named after him.

Another president mentioned was William M. Jardine, who instructed co-ed students "not to remove bloomers while dancing and to wear skirts below the knee."

Milton Eisenhower, who began his term in 1943, was the man responsible for changing the name from "Kansas State Agricultural College" to "Kansas State University," Jack said.

He closed his speech with information on Annie Pillsbury, whose family were early pioneers, arriving in 1854 to what is now known as Pillsbury Crossing. One of her poems, "A Wash Day Lyric," was read.

"K-State has been my playground since 1945," Don Slater, Manhattan resident, said. "Lowell Jack did a great job, and I think the world of him. He does his research well, and it's based on fact. History has to be based on fact. If not, it's not really history."

About 35 people attended the speech.

"Any of these people could have books written about them. I have only skimmed the surface," Jack said.

New provision allows drug offenders to receive aid

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

New legislation could no longer deny federal education aid from student drug offenders.

Congress has rewritten the Higher Education Act Drug Provision, which states that if a student has a previous or current drug conviction, they will not receive financial aid.

The revision will allow students with a previous drug offense to receive aid, although students who are convicted while in college will lose eligibility.

Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance, said prior to the new legislation, students would have to indicate whether they had a drug offense or not. Then a follow-up would be done by the U.S. Department of Education.

The school was never given the information and he said there is no way of knowing how many students at K-State have been affected. He said students convicted while in school and who are receiving aid are the two things that need to go together.

"I think this is a good idea because prior to the legislation there were so many students that were prevented from getting an education because of something they did years ago," he said. "This makes it more possible for students to get a college education."

He said the new bill might not take effect until July 1, 2007, and there will be some time before the Department of Education gives schools guidance on how to approach the new legislation.

He said 70 percent of students receive some sort of financial assistance at K-State, which adds up to about $150 million a year.

Tom Angell, campaigns director for the Students for a Sensible Drug Policy, said the SSDP is happy more students are going to be able to get aid, but hopes that other students will not continue to be left behind.

"I think this will help a small number of people," he said. "Juvenile convictions aren't taken into account, and there are a majority of people who are affected and get convicted while in college."

He said pulling people out of school who are convicted

Today is the final day to file for a position in Student Governing Association elections.

Students can print off filing forms from www.ksu.edu/elections or get them from the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

Forms are due by 4 p.m. to OSAS.

Bill Harlan, assistant coordinator of OSAS, said there are 60 positions available for Student Senate. There also are positions available for college councils, Board of Student Publications, Union Governing Board, president and vice

Web site to update

By Melissa Baier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students and faculty will wake up to a more technologically advanced K-State home page early Feb. 20.

Neil Erdwien, Web technologies manager in computing and network services, said his team will work from midnight to 6 a.m. updating the Web site. Students will still be able to access the entire K-State Web site system while it's being updated, and K-State Online will not be affected.

"If there's any downtime, it'll be about 15 seconds while we restart things," Erdwien said. "At worst, people would notice that some pages have changed and some haven't."

This is the first time in five years the system has been updated.

"I think it's important that we update the Web site periodically and not let it become stale," Erdwien said. "Just so it's always stays fresh and dynamic."

The format will take on a more vertical style with new photos and categories and will prominently feature news and events.

In order to design the new site, Student Services conducted ability testing to get feedback from students, faculty and staff, alumni and even future students in order to create a more useful Web site, said Sharon Morrow, director of

Teams compete in relay, trivia to raise sexual awareness at SHAPE event

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Coochie Snatchers took first place in the Battle of the Sexperts Thursday night in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Second place went to the G Spots. Both groups were part of several competing in three rounds of the event, sponsored by Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators through Lafene Heath Center.

Pheasant Weber, senior in psychology, member of SHAPE and moderator for the event, began the evening with introductions of the competitors and instructed the groups that there was to be no profanity, nudity or outside help in answering the questions asked.

One of the most popular parts of the event was the relay race. Participants wore beer goggles and attempted to take an object out of a bucket and carry it to another bucket.

"My favorite part was the race, because we wore condoms on our hands and we wore beer goggles," Ashley Horner, junior in sociology, said.

Horner and her Kappa Delta sorority sisters Lori Elliott, sophomore in secondary education, and Alexandra Wilson, sophomore in pre-psychology, competed as a group called the Coochie Snatchers.

The race was a favorite with Araceli Hernandez, senior in secondary education, as well.

"It was dizzy," Hernandez said. "It really felt like you were intoxicated or something."

Hernandez was competing with a group known as the G Spots. The group included Sheena Nagaraja, senior in biology; Anna Avila, senior in kinesiology and Angelika Huquley, senior in political science.

The second round consisted of trivia questions about topics such as Sexual Transmitted Diseases and other sexual issues.

One question dealt with condom use and who should remove the condom after sex. The answer was: the person whose bodily fluids are on the outside of the condom.

Senate discusses combination of 2 standing committees

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate introduced the legislation of combining the duties and responsibilities of the Student Affairs and Social Services Standing Committee with the Academic Affairs and University Relations Standing Committee at Thursday night's meeting.

Legislation also was introduced in regards to making the Student Senate Representative to Faculty Senate the new Student and Academic Affairs Standing Committee chair.

If the committees are combined, there will be a reallocation of senators and interns at the beginning of the 2006-07 Student Senate term.

Senate Operations Committee Chair Brandon Sager said the possibility of combining the two committees has been discussed in the last three or four years.

The proposed legislation will be further discussed at Tuesday's Senate Operations Committee meeting, and Student Senate will take final action on the bills at next Thursday's meeting, Sager said.

Academic Affairs and University Relations Chair

Nacole Boan said combining the two committees would create a constant flow of duties and responsibilities.

"Since Faculty Representative Senate member serves on Faculty Senate Academic Affairs meetings, it will create a better line of communication," Boan said.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

Fort Riley mission

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A combat team based at Fort Riley will get a new mission to help train foreign security forces such as those in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army announced Thursday. Army General Dan McNeil, commanding general of U.S. Army Forces Command, briefed Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas on the new training mission for the First Infantry Division's First Brigade Combat Team at Fort Riley.

Bush approval

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Texas authorities closed the investigation into Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident Thursday without bringing any charges. President Bush said Cheney had handled the situation "just fine." "I'm satisfied with the explanation he gave," Bush said, making his first public comments about Cheney's accidental shooting of 78-year-old attorney Harry Whittington while aiming for a quail.

Gitmo prison

NEW YORK — U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Thursday said the United States should close the prison at Guantanamo Bay for terror suspects as soon as possible, backing a key conclusion of a U.N.-appointed independent panel. White House spokesman Scott McClellan rejected the call to shut the camp, saying the military treats all detainees humanely and "these are dangerous terrorists that we're talking about."

Going hunting

Guns and hunting are back in the news this week, with the recent incident in which Vice President Dick Cheney accidentally shot a fellow hunting companion on a Texas ranch.

Kansas' state parks receive lowest funding

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas receives the lowest amount of funding in the nation for its 24 state parks, according to an Associated Press report.

Kansas parks have a history of low funding, but the budget cuts made in the last 10 years moved Kansas into the lowest funded position, said Alan Stark, regional park supervisor for central Kansas.

"This is an accumulation of several things," Stark said. "This hasn't happened overnight."

The low funding has had a negative effect on state parks over the last 10 years, but the problem is becoming increasingly severe and the need for new funding is urgent, said Todd Lovin, Tuttle Creek State Park manager.

"We are doing everything we can right now," Lovin said. "And we have been — for years — going by the skin of our teeth a little bit and we are kind of reaching a breaking point. It can't go much further — certain areas of campground are closing and certain facilities are closing."

Lovin said Tuttle Creek is funded mostly by user fees.

"Ten years ago the state general funds made up about 65 percent of overall pay structure," Lovin said. "Now that's down to about 13 percent, which means that our overall budget is made up around 85 percent from user fees."

The money allocated to the parks is getting lower, and the expenses involved with maintaining the parks are rising, Lovin said.

"When I first arrived, our utility bill was about 10 to 12 percent of overall budget, and today that figure is more like 35 percent," Lovin said. "Like anyone in their home we have to pay the high utilities bills and high gas bills — we have to pick up all these additional costs."

The decrease in funding provides a lot of challenges to deal with, Stark said.

"If something breaks, we don't have the money to fix it," Stark said.

"We have reduced the areas we mow, closed areas to vehicles during off-season — this doesn't save much money, but every dollar counts."

The decrease in funding for parks also has affected the parks' employees.

"We have had a high turnover rate because things are tough with salaries," said Stark.

Senate Bill 87 was introduced last year and if passed, it would improve the financial situation of state parks.

The bill states that in addition to the annual registration fees, any applicant for vehicle registration or renewal for a vehicle registered for the gross weight of 16,000 pounds or less shall pay an additional outdoor recreation registration fee of $4.

Eighty cents would be credited to the local outdoor recreation grant program, and the remainder would be credited to the parks' fee fund.

The bill has not yet been voted on, Stark said.

"This would give us the money we had three years ago," Stark said. "It would really help because it would be a constant stream of money and we would know it was coming in."

Once a resident pays the fee they would get admission to any state park free for one year. This could encourage more people to visit the parks, Stark said.

"Four dollars a year to gain entry to the parks is cheap," Stark said. "This would be helpful for young families, students and people on a fixed income."

A state park provides numerous services to a community and is a great resource for generating money within a community, Lovin said.

"What you do with parks has a tremendous positive affect on the community," Lovin said.

"A great example of that here is the Country Stampede, which brings in millions of dollars for the community."

Lacey Coup, president of Park and Recreation Management Club, said she is not happy with the lack of funding in state parks.

"I think it sucks because we have a lot of good places in the parks but not enough money to really fix these places up," said Coup, senior in park management and conservation.

"These parks bring a lot of good stuff to a community, and it allows for camping and hanging out with family."

Until a financial solution is reached, the parks will continue to deteriorate, Lovin said.

"You can only delay fixing things for so long," Lovin said. "And you can only scavenge and borrow materials for only so long."

"We need to have a stable funding base that provides continuity and the stable base that you need; you can only go so far with the user fees until your visitation is hurt"

Artist addresses race, age issues

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bill Hutson spoke at 4:30 yesterday at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art as part of the "Something to Look Forward To" presentation, for which he also is the curator.

In fact, Hutson is the Jennie Brown and Betsy Hess Cook Distinguished Artist-in-Residence for Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster, Penn.

Hutson was brought in through a joint effort by the Student Friends of the Beach Museum of Art, Student Government Association and the Black Student Union, and during his speech, spoke about the artists on display, the individual works and the process of putting the exhibit together.

That exhibit itself features abstract art by African-American artists, but with an added twist — all of the artists are 60 or older.

Hutson, who knows all of the artists featured, spoke of the often-overlooked contributions of African-American artists in the art world.

"Most of the exhibitions we have are white shows," he said. "We don't call them that, but that's what they are."

But the increase of African-American artists over the years, as well as their penetration into teaching at the university level, has brought increased attention to their works, he said.

In addition to ethnicity, Hutson spoke of the difficulties facing older artists.

"Our society continues to lean on the issue of youth," he said.

Most exhibits feature works by younger artists, and grants are more difficult to come by for older artists, he said. This can be a challenge for many who do not mature artistically until later in life.

For those who helped to bring the exhibit, and Hutson, to K-State the experience was a rewarding one.

"The exhibit was one of those serendipity things," said Kathrine Schlageck, Education and Public Services Superintendent for the Beach Museum of Art.

New class to target snowboarders, skiers

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Beginning in March, Peters Recreation Complex will offer a class that could help students with their spring break plans — but not by getting their bodies beach-ready. Instead, the newest BOSU class will be geared toward those who choose to hit the slopes.

"We've already been offering BOSU sessions on a six-week basis, and that's for an overall fitness-type class," said Amber Long, assistant director of fitness at the Rec Complex.

The newest BOSU class will use the principles of balance, strength and flexibility training specifically to help those interested in skiing or snowboarding, Long said.

"It's going to be a one-hour, one-time thing," Long said. "The work will be balance, quickness, strength and agility, which is really beneficial for skiers and snowboarders."

Long also said because the workout is presented in a class format, some people might think it is more of an aerobic-type class, which it isn't.

"People see aerobics as being more rhythmically driven," she said. "This isn't — it's more like athletic training, which can appeal to and benefit both men and women."

"This will be my first time skiing," Ashley Klich, junior in architectural engineering, said of her upcoming spring break plans. "I think (the class) would be worth a shot, definitely, especially if it targets the muscles you're going to need out there."

Rec patrons can sign up for either the 5 p.m. March 5 or 8 p.m. March 7 session in the administrative office.

"The class uses the ball — it's actually like half of a ball — and they do exercises to help with balance, strength, and flexibility," said Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services.

Long will teach the class, which will cost $5 per session.

TO THE POINT Education Act should address all felonies

Congress made a good move in re-writing the Higher Education Act Drug Provision. People change, and getting an education after making such a change could be extremely beneficial to them.

However, this change doesn't go nearly far enough. Singling out a specific crime to remove financial aid is ridiculous. This provision should be all-or-nothing, with content not being a factor.

Why should it matter if you're doing drugs? As long as you maintain good grades, there should be no problems. Besides, alcohol can have just as bad of an affect on grades as anything else.

If the government is more concerned about keeping upright citizens in college, there are less intrusive ways of doing this. Take how easy it would be to change drug offenses to any felony. Students wouldn't continue to lose aid due to a misdemeanor, while the provision would still have the same affect on all felons.

If punishing any felony this way in Kansas is too strict, the provision should be removed. We have established these crimes as being the worst, and if any, they deserve this punishment.

The small step Congress has taken is at least a step in the right direction. While we applaud the effort, we should also remember that there is much more that should be done.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Spring break angst

Spending week off at home has its advantages

In my younger years, I was fairly knowledgeable in the areas of international airports and not drinking the water in Mexico.

My parents loved to travel, and during Christmas, summer, or spring breaks, we would occasionally do a decent amount of it. Compared to the unrelenting cold wind of southwest Kansas, the sunny beaches of a more southern region were much more desirable.

This usually meant Mexico or some palm tree-laden island deep in the Caribbean Sea.

I'll say it before you can — yes, I was a little spoiled.

It was great, though; all I was required to do was drag my own luggage through the airport, and even that had wheels. Sun, sand and all the guacamole I could handle.

Then, that horrible moment came when I grew up. All of the sudden, my parents weren't quite so anxious to dole out money for a few days of relaxation, especially since I didn't want them to go with me.

Working part-time as a waitress doesn't buy many airline miles, I quickly discovered.

Therefore, when spring break rolls around in that much-anticipated, glorious week of March, you can find me gazing at ridiculously good-looking bronzed men playing volleyball and viewing vast amounts of co-ed games featuring little clothing and whipped cream.

On MTV, in my living room in good old, unrelentingly windy southwest Kansas.

But as I sit in class and listen, to everyone else's planned escapades to Padre, Cabo, Cuba, God knows where; I have come to a conclusion.

Staying home for Spring Break is better anyway.

And yet you scoff. Therefore, to pull you over to my side of the fence, I have graciously compiled a plethora of reasons why my fellow non-travelers and I are the smart ones of the bunch.

MEGAN MOLITOR

First of all, the money issue. While many of my peers are off spending their hard-earned cash on plane tickets and all-inclusive resorts, I will be taking the more frugal path.

My money will be spent on gas for the ride home, bags of Cheetos, issues of Cosmo and Glamour, and perhaps even a box of those really good sugar cookies with an inch of pink frosting on them that I love so much.

So when you Spring-Breakers return tan, refreshed and broke, I will laugh and throw my saved money into the air and dance around in it, like they do in movies.

Secondly, the issue of disease. Do you realize how many germs and unknown ailments exist outside of United States' borders? I still shiver in remembrance of an unpleasant experience I had eating ice from my glass of soda at a restaurant in Cancun that kept me bed-ridden for the rest of the trip.

And that was simply from ice, which is common in any country. Imagine the infections and viruses existing in more complex items, like burritos or iced tea. That in itself is enough to keep me on my couch for the week as opposed to risking my life for a few days of a salt-filled ocean breeze.

My third and final reason for anti-spring breaking is one that should be obvious to all of us. Very rarely is an entire week thrown in our laps, and provides a great excuse for — you guessed it — extra studying. When my grades skyrocket as a result of seven days of hitting the books, and the rest of the world has nothing to show for it but a sunburn, it is my sincerest hope those people are filled with immense amounts of regret.

Perhaps this is only my bitter rant of dreams of a Spring Break better spent. No, no "perhaps"; that's pretty much what it is. So I wish you well, spring-breakers, and drink a Piña Colada for me, as I drink a Pepsi on my lonely living room couch.

Blasphemy may hinder spiritual progression

I've learned that my friends and I can do anything or nothing and still have a "productive" time.

This was the case one day when I was watching TV with one of my buddies.

We were watching a show featuring David Blaine. He was doing some pretty impressive stuff, pulling off things as if he had external assistance. A few could even consider his magic tricks to be "miracles."

As a side note, I don't think I would place myself in that category. Where some might see miracles, I see something that is highly improbable.

But, in this existence that I believe contains infinite possibility, it seems only inevitable that highly improbable situations will, in fact, occur.

I call these occurrences something: coincidence. However, I do believe in miracles, but probably not in the traditional sense. I think a miracle is the willingness to see the common in an uncommon way.

Anyway, my friend, who we'll consider to be moderately religious, said about David Blaine, "This guy thinks he is the Messiah." He was disturbed by the magician's supposed belief about himself.

I tried to evaluate why this bothered my friend so much. I determined it was because sacrilege has gone against what he has been taught. The indoctrination of principles and values of his religion has prescribed that blasphemy is bad. Further thought on the matter is unnecessary because the value is already firmly established.

In response to my friend's comment, I asked, "Is there anything wrong with him thinking he is the Messiah, aside from blasphemy?"

He didn't say anything right away.

Let me just mention before moving on, I would say that I am spiritual, but not religious. Because of this, blasphemy doesn't really bother me. For me, the division between spirituality and religion is organization. Religion consists of a belief system that has members. Spirituality is an individual continuous process in search of the truth — one I hope never stops. I enjoy the process because it is tailor-made.

That being said, my friend and I started to argue about the concept of people believing that they were the Messiah.

I contended that even though they might be committing blasphemy, it says nothing about their ethical foundation, which could be morally sound. The focus on whether people are divinely ordained detracts from what their words or actions are actually saying.

I explained how I thought that was the problem with religion, because so much focus is directed on the medium — the Prophet or the Holy Book — that the message gets lost. They are all saying the same thing anyway: Live in harmony. Does origin really matter?

Our argument was gaining volume as we both tried to extend our points. It is possible an observer could have heard our verbal altercation.

Suddenly, there was a knock on the door that forced my friend and I to suspend our dialogue that appeared to be getting nowhere. I turned the handle and opened the door to find no one visibly present. However, I noticed a folded piece of paper lying on the "welcome" mat.

I opened it and saw a single sentence written in pencil. In the most ordinary writing, it said, "There is an old story that, if we were to treat every person we met as if they were the Messiah, then it wouldn't make any difference if they weren't."

University remains secure in contract with Pepsi

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several universities across the nation are taking action to sever their contracts with Coca-Cola because of alleged human rights violations in its South American bottling plants, according to a Feb. 2 Vanderbilt Hustler article.

According to the same article, one of the most serious allegations against the global soft drink company includes the murder of a Coca-Cola plant worker in a Colombian factory.

Activists remain concerned that Coke refused a third-party investigation, and instead funded its own investigation, the article said.

K-State, however, established a contract with PepsiCo on Jan. 10, 2000.

"If KSU happened to have had a contract with Coca-Cola, would the university have reconsidered their deal in light of these allegations? Yes, but only if student groups like SEA pushed a successful campaign," said Becky Clark, senior in biology and vice president of Students for Environmental Action. "You could say I feel better that we have a contract with Pepsi rather than Coca-Cola."

Before K-State's contract with Pepsi was established, university officials negotiated with representatives from both Coke and PepsiCo, and found PepsiCo offered the better contract, said Keith Ratzloff, assistant vice president at the controller's office.

The main reason K-State chose to enter into a contract with PepsiCo over Coke was the fact that Pepsi was willing to contribute for a higher rate, which means more money for the university, Ratzloff said.

The contract is set to expire on June 30, 2010.

Another provision specified in the contract is PepsiCo must pay K-State at least $335,000 annually – if this much money is not made from sales, the company must make up the difference itself.

Since 2000, K-State has earned an annual average of $450,000 from this contract. This money benefits various on-campus entities and organizations. Hale Library is one of the main beneficiaries of these profits.

"We wanted to make sure the money was used appropriately because, obviously, the majority of the product is sold to students," Ratzloff said. "We're sensitive to the fact that that money ought to come back and be used for academic purposes. To us, the most central beneficiary would have been the library," he said.

K-State received a payment of $1 million on the day the agreement became effective, which was allocated to the Library Operating Endowment. The Library Operating Endowment also receives a payment of $400,000, which is paid on Jan. 10 of each year.

An allocation of $137,500 also benefits Intercollegiate Athletics for signage pursuant to contract and PepsiCo provides a minimum of $50,000 to marketing and promotion annually.

K-State also receives a 50-percent commission on all vending machine sales and a 14-percent commission on all snack vending machine sales.

According to the contract, individual agreements were made to accommodate each campus entity.

For example, the K-State Student Union and Bramlage Coliseum each have individual agreements, Ratzloff said.

The Union is one of the largest consumers of Pepsi products. When such campus entities purchase Pepsi products for retail, they are buying at reduced prices, which allows soft drinks to be sold cheaper on campus.

"That's why, in the Cats Den Convenience Store, the 20-ounce bottles are cheaper than in other places around town," said Bill Wisdom, assistant director of retail at the Union, said.

When a business comes into the Union, such as Subway or Burger King, which have contracts with Coca-Cola, the business must work with K-State in accommodating the PepsiCo contract, Wisdom.

"One of the trade-offs we had with Pepsi is that they wanted a presence, and an exclusive presence on campus," Ratzloff said. "In order to get that, they paid the price."

Director: CASA needs male, African-American volunteers

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sunflower Court-Appointed Special Advocates, Inc. is in need of male and black volunteers.

"The next round of CASA training sessions begin Monday night.

Sunflower CASA Executive Director Jayme Morris-Hardeman said about 10 percent of Sunflower CASA's 113 volunteers are men, and there is only one black volunteer.

In 2005, Sunflower CASA served 145 children, of which 50 percent were male and 21 percent were black.

"It would be nice to have a volunteer pool that is more representative of the children we serve," Morris-Hardeman said.

CASA is comprised of volunteers who serve as advocates for abused and neglected children who are in the court system, Morris-Hardeman said.

By serving as mentors, volunteers also investigate the circumstances of the child's life so the judge can make the best decision for the child, she said.

"We have some children whose cases started the day they were born and some that started when they were 17, so we see it all," Morris-Hardeman said.

For about 10 hours a month, volunteers spend time with the children in their cases to find out different aspects of their lives.

This is done by spending time with the child and also speaking to other people in the child's life, Morris-Hardeman said.

"All of the information is to advocate what is best for the child," Morris-Hardeman said. "Volunteers are also trying to get the information together for the judge so he can make the best decision for the child."

During training, potential CASA volunteers will learn about the court system and will have the chance to write a court report, Morris-Hardeman said. Attorneys, social workers, current CASA volunteers and other guest speakers also will speak each night of training.

Morris-Hardeman said volunteers must be at least 18 years old and must pass a Social Rehabilitation Services child abuse background check and FBI criminal background check. Volunteers also must be able to commit one year to the program since the average case length is a year-and-a-half, Morris-Hardeman said.

"We do have co-CASAs on cases, so in case someone is gone for the summer or study abroad, their partner will take over the case when they're gone," she said.

While all academic majors are eligible to volunteer, Morris-Hardeman said it is good career experience for social work, family studies, education, criminology and pre-law majors.

"It allows you to get real-life experience and see what you would be doing in your careers," she said.

political science, said she has been an active volunteer with CASA since September and volunteers about three hours a week.

Taddiken said she began volunteering at CASA after her academic adviser recommended it.

"There are a lot of kids who need someone to speak up for them on their behalf, so I signed up," she said.

Taddiken said in past cases, she has done craft projects, watched movies and gone on other social outings with the children.

"We're able to really see what these kids are like and what the best situations would be for them," Taddiken said. "We serve as the ears and eyes for the kids."

Abbie Adams, development director for CASA, said volunteering for CASA gives students and community members a chance to make a difference in the community.

"There are problems in the world, but community members can make a difference right here by giving a little of time for kids," Adams said. "Volunteers can make sure they are well-represented and spoken for in court."

Ad hoc chorus to perform Saturday through combined production

By Owen Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Arts Center and Side By Side Theatre and Music will co-produce the community ad hoc chorus performance of Fauré's "Requiem" at 7:30 p.m. Saturday at the Manhattan Arts Center.

Shauna Tominey, program and marketing director for the center, said an ad hoc chorus is open to all members of the community.

"A community sing-along is an easy way to look at it," Tominey said.

Penny Senften, executive director of the center, said ad hoc performances are difficult because there are few rehearsals. But she said the difficulty makes the performance that much better.

"(We have) people who are extremely competent singers, especially because there isn't time for people to sit down and read the music," Senften said.

Tominey said a requiem is a musical mass for the dead, usually featuring a vocalist, a chorus and an orchestra. She said Fauré's "Requiem" is different than most requiems, because it is not a dark piece about the sadder side of death.

Reginald Pittman, associate professor of music, said Fauré described his requiem as more of a celebration of life, rather than a mourning of death.

"My requiem is said not to express any sense of terror in the face of death," Fauré once said.

"Someone called it a lullaby of death. But that's how I feel about death – a happy deliverance, a yearning for the joys of the afterlife, rather than a painful passing away."

Pittman will conduct the chorus, along with accompanist William Wingfield, instructor of music. Pittman said there are no qualifications to participate in the chorus.

"(There is) just a desire to learn quickly, since we only have two rehearsals," Pitt-

Senften said all aspects of the production will make it an enjoyable experience.

"Reg (Pittman) is a very, very good conductor," Senften said. "We have William Wingfield, the campus accompanist, and excellent singers. So we've got the best. You've got all the ingredients."

Pittman said he enjoys working with the chorus because people usually do not have this opportunity.

"This gives me the opportunity to work with the local talent in Manhattan and together perform music that we don't often have the opportunity to perform or hear," he said.

K-State looks to turn things around against Colorado

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The last time the K-State men's basketball team prepared to play Colorado, second place in the Big 12 Conference was on the line.

Now, the Wildcats are struggling to stay alive in the Big 12 standings.

After Colorado defeated the Wildcats on 79-75 Jan. 28 in Boulder, Colo., the two teams have headed in opposite directions.

K-State (13-9, 4-7) has lost five of its last six games, while Colorado (17-5, 7-4) enters Saturday's contest on a two-game winning streak and tied for third in the Big 12.

Most recently, Colorado defeated No. 19 Oklahoma 84-75 Wednesday in Boulder.

K-State, on the other hand, is trying to rebound from a 70-56 loss to Texas Tech on Wednesday — its second double-digit loss of the season.

Coach Jim Wooldridge returned to the K-State sideline wearing a neck brace Wednesday, one week after he underwent neck surgery.

The Wildcats did not give Wooldridge much reason to smile against Texas Tech, as they shot 35 percent from the field and turned the ball over 17 times.

K-State, tied for eighth in the Big 12 with Iowa State and Missouri, will try to slow down a Colorado team that leads the conference in scoring at 80.6 points per game.

Richard Roby is Colorado's leading scorer with an average of 18.6 points, good for fourth in the conference. Roby ranks in the same spot as K-State's junior forward Cartier Martin, who also averages 18.6 points.

Colorado has made more 3-pointers (196) than any other Big 12 team. The Buffaloes also are No. 1 in blocks (6.9 per game) and rank second in rebounds (41.6 per game) and assists (17.5 per game).

The last time the two squads squared off, Martin had a game-high 24 points on 7-of-15 shooting, while junior guard Lance Harris broke out of a shooting slump with 23 points on 10-of-12 shooting.

Roby led four Buffaloes in double digits with a team-high 18 points.

Wildcats travel to Lincoln to meet up with Huskers

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Wildcats used their bye week to recuperate from a 71-66 loss to Iowa State on Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum and to prepare for the stretch run of the Big 12 Conference season.

"It was a great opportunity for us to regain our focus and work on the things we needed to," freshman Shalee Lehning said. "We have our last four games, so we can really focus on finishing strong, and we are all rested up and ready to go."

The Wildcats (17-6, 7-5) will begin that four-game run by traveling to Lincoln, Neb., to take on the Nebraska Cornhuskers (13-10, 5-7) on Saturday.

Freshman Danielle Zanotti said the time off was beneficial for the Wildcats, who have gone 1-1 since facing the Cornhuskers Feb. 4.

"I think it was a time to re-motivate, time to rest and time to refocus," Zanotti said. "Now, we just have to go out there and prove we are a team that can contend for an NCAA bid."

In their previous meeting, the Wildcats had four players in double figures — led by sophomore Kimberly Dietz with 19 points — downing the Cornhuskers 71-64 in Manhattan.

Nebraska is 1-2 since losing to K-State but are coming off a 65-57 win against Kansas on Wednesday in Lawrence.

Juniors Jessica Gerhart and Keira Hardy led the way for the Cornhuskers against the Jayhawks by combining for 33 points. Freshman standout Kelsey Griffin was held to just five points against the Jayhawks, but the two-time freshman of the week is averaging 14.5 points per game.

Coach Deb Patterson said Nebraska will look to build off of its momentum from Wednesday.

"They're good at home, they played us well at home, they're extremely physical, and Griffin is one of the best post-players around right now in the league," Patterson said. "Between she (Griffin) and Hardy and them playing at home, we know we have a challenge on our hands."

Although K-State is coming off a loss and going on the road, the Wildcats have still won three of their last four games that have come after a loss.

Lehning said K-State focused on a number of things during its week off.

"We really have to focus on defense and our intensity," Lehning said. "Just working hard and having fun, because it's something that we really haven't been doing lately and we are really going to focus on these two games to really try and compete for 40 minutes of a game and not just be a first-half team."

BBC | Roudy, Wiley lead K-State to 13-3 win

Joe Roudy and Byron Wiley each collected a career-high four hits, including homers, as K-State won its season opener 13-3 over Texas-Arlington Thursday evening at Clay Gould Ballpark. K-State collected 18 hits on the night, which included seven doubles and two home runs, as the Wildcats gave coach Brad Hill his first season-opening win with the Wildcats.

Roudy finished 4-for-5 with three runs and two RBI, while Wiley, a freshman, drove in five runs and scored two on his career debut night as a Wildcat. Freshman Tyler Link added two hits in his debut, while Cris Tapia finished 3-for-5 with three RBI. Sophomore Brad Hutt (1-0) picked up the win after 6.0 innings.

OLY | Wescott brings home gold for America

Suspended in midair, Seth Wescott's biggest worry was making sure he didn't land on top of his opponent and crush him. Not exactly a typical Olympic moment.

Then again, snowboard-cross isn't a typical Olympic sport.

The American racer missed Slovakia's Radoslav Zidek on that tight landing Thursday, then passed him for the win in the Olympic debut of the wild sport of snowboard-cross.

For that, Wescott earned a gold medal. Everyone else got warm compresses and aspirin.

OLY | Russian athlete ejected, stripped of medal

Russian biathlete Olga Pyleva was thrown out of the Olympics and stripped of her silver medal Thursday for failing a drug test.

The first athlete caught for doping at the Torino Games. Pyleva, who won silver at the 15km event Monday, was scratched just before the start of Thursday's 7.5km sprint, in which she was considered a leading medal contender. She also won gold and bronze medals at the 2002 Salt Lake City Games.

A hastily-convened, three-member IOC panel found Pyleva guilty of a doping violation. She had tested positive for the banned stimulant carphedon in a urine test after Monday's race.

NHL | Tocchet's N.J. court appearance is waived

At the request of defense attorneys, the first court appearance has been waived for former NHL star Rick Tocchet and two others accused of participation in a multimillion-dollar gambling ring.

Tocchet, as well as New Jersey state trooper James Harney and James Ulmer, were scheduled for a first appearance and arraignment Tuesday before Burlington County Superior Court Judge Thomas Smith in Mount Holly, N.J.

The hearing was expected to be largely procedural.

Track team readies for competition

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track team will be host to a final meet this Saturday to tune up for the Big 12 Conference Indoor Championships. The KSU Open will begin at 10 a.m. at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats hope to continue their record-breaking ways into the Big 12 Championships.

Senior Shunte Thomas broke her own school over-sized track record in the 400-meter dash last week at the ISU Classic in Ames, Iowa, with a time of 53.36.

Thomas is a native of Coral Springs, Fla.

Senior Christian Smith is one record-breaker who comes to mind. Smith, who was named the Big 12 Athlete of the Week on Feb. 7, broke a 20-year old national collegiate record in the men's 1,000-meter run with a time of 2:19.57. The time has been accepted by Track and Field News as a national record.

Another record broken this season was by Breanna Eveland. The senior pole vaulter leapt to a height of 14 feet, 1.25 inches at the Sevine Husker Invitational on Feb. 4. Eveland, a native of Grand Rapids, Mich., reset her own school record with the jump and is the first woman in K-State history to jump over 14 feet in the pole vault.

Another senior, Kyle Lancaster, cleared 7 feet, 2.5 inches in the high jump at the Husker Invitational to win the event, beating out three other All-Americans. Lancaster cleared the height on his first attempt, while the other competitors cleared it on their second or third attempts. Lancaster has cleared seven feet in the high

Thomas deserves HOF nod

Former Kansas City Chiefs linebacker Derrick Thomas should be in the Pro Football Hall of Fame.

The late Thomas' family deserves to be invited to Canton, Ohio on Aug. 5-6 for his induction.

But for a second straight year, D.T. was overlooked. For a second straight year, Thomas' loved ones are left wondering if and when the invitation will come.

Thomas had a brilliant career for the Chiefs, though it was cut short by a serious auto accident on Jan. 23, 2000.

Less than a month after being paralyzed from the chest down, Thomas died of cardio-respiratory arrest from a massive blood clot in an artery between his lungs and heart.

I remember where I was when I heard the horrible news. It will always be etched in my mind. Thomas had just turned 33 years old.

Drama students entertain lunch-time audiences at Purple Masque Theatre

Those who made it to Purple Masque Theatre Thursday afternoon were able to witness the antics of Captain Neato-Man and his potential sidekick Larry, also known as Horatio, during the first installment of Lunchbag Theater presented by the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance.

The Lunchbag Theater production is a series of lunchtime shows by theater department students that are written, directed, produced by and star drama students. The shows are created and rehearsed in a span of four weeks and are then open to the public on most Thursday afternoons for free.

John Richards, senior in psychology, directed the first show and purchased much of the set on a limited budget. He said he was pleased with the first production.

"It was a really good turnout, I thought, with three fourths of the seats full," Richards said. "Hopefully, the others will have crowds like this one."

The first show centered on the character Larry, who answers a newspaper ad looking for a job as a typist. The ad lands him in the house of Captain Neato-Man, who tries to convince Larry to be his sidekick, nicknamed "Horatio."

Richards said the students will see quality entertainment.

"It is an opportunity for people get to see good, one-act theater for free," Richards said. "People who come in get to see theater at its basic guts."

Richards said he was pleased with the performance of his cast, and said a show of this type was a difficult technical challenge.

"A show like this can be hard with the few lighting and sound cues we have," he said. "We wanted it to have some realism, but it needed to have a very comedic and fake sense at the same time."

Jefferson Cox, senior in psychology, starred as Captain Neato-Man and spent much of his time on stage dancing around in super-hero tights while trying to convince Larry to join his crusade against evil.

"I thought the show went really well," Cox said. "This was a play we've wanted to do for a while, so we were all very intent on doing it."

Scott Mulryan, senior in theater, starred as Larry and said the show was fun to perform.

trust and comfort factor in our performances," Mulryan said. "We perform the show and get critiqued by our classmates before showing it to the public."

Ryan Bruce, senior in apparel marketing and design, said he enjoyed the show.

"The show was very enjoyable and tremendously funny," Bruce said. "For a Lunchbag performance, it was great fun."

'Curious George' provides nonstop fun, solid animation

"Curious George"

★★★★☆

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

"Curious George" is a mellow but amusing film that perfectly captures the spirit of the children's novels.

The film follows the Man in the Yellow Hat (Will Ferrell) on an unsuccessful expedition to find an ancient shrine in order to draw more visitors to his failing museum.

Along the way he picks up a young monkey, whose curiosity often gets the better of him.

The plot doesn't exactly push the envelope, but in an 86-minute children's movie, opportunities for innovation are rare.

The animation looked rather unappealing in the film's trailer, but it perfectly captures the charm of the illustrations in the books. Every scene is bright and crisp, and the character's movements are believable within the world the animators have created.

It isn't as impressive as something from Pixar or Dreamworks, but it perfectly suits the scenes taken directly from the books.

The voice acting also was excellent. I was worried that Ferrell's over-the-top persona would dominate the film, but he manages to stay charming without becoming overbearing.

The film also features the voices of Dick Van Dyke, Drew Barrymore, David Cross and Eugene Levy. All of the actors do excellent work, and Barrymore's lack of dialogue is the only disappointment.

Thankfully, no voice is given to George other than animal noises provided by Frank Weller (Puttarama, The Simpsons). As a result, Jack Johnson's soundtrack accompanies most of George's exploits.

The movie's main downfall is its intended audience. Kids will love it, but older audiences might become bored with the juvenile humor and predictable plot.

In my opinion, any movie with a monkey as a main character probably is going to be good. Curious George won't win any Oscars, but it provides an enjoyable movie going experience.

With animated films like "Hoodwinked" and Pixar's upcoming "Cars," 2006 looks like it is going to be a great year for animated films.

Alex Reisenweber, lead singer for the band Barefoot Rebellion, performs at the second annual Campaign for Nonviolence Benefit Show on Thursday night at Auntie Mae's Parlor.

Concert raises money for center

By Matthew Peterworth
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The second annual Campaign for Nonviolence Benefit Show was Thursday night at Auntie Mae's Parlor.

Barefoot Rebellion, a Manhattan band, has played both shows for free, said Tony "Buck" Buckner, a writer and lead singer for the band.

The show benefits the K-State Women's Center, said Kristina Kramer, senior in sociology and staff member who organized the event.

"The show is part of the Season for Nonviolence, which is going on right now," Kramer said.

Kramer asked Barefoot Rebellion to play because Buckner was willing to do so and easy to work with, she said.

"They played last year and promote nonviolence in their songs," she said. "They're doing this for free. It's something we believe in, especially when it comes to violence against women."

Some of the songs talk about issues that are not in the social norm, like domestic violence, Buckner said.

"Anytime you can bring a social issue to the forefront, do it. And music can do that," he said.

The benefit brought in $500 last year and raised more than $200 Thursday night, Kramer said. The Campaign for Nonviolence also gave away door prizes throughout the evening donated from Auntie Mae's and other Aggieville businesses, she said.

Some of the money raised from the show will go towards financing next year's campaign. The rest of the money helps pay for job opportunities at the Women's Center.

"It provides an extra on-call sexual assault advocate for 24 hour emergency calls to the Women's Center," said Megan Challenger, senior in political science and center staff member.

Burke LeValley, former K-State student and current Manhattan resident, came out for the show.

"I heard it was a good band and for a good cause," LeValley said.

The show helps to bring awareness to the center, so people know there is a place to go, Buckner said.

"The only way to stop violence against women is to bring awareness to it," Buckner said, "especially in a college town, because most attacks done on women are done in college towns. If I didn't believe in it, I wouldn't do it. We have no problem playing a show for free and helping someone out."

Tennis team ready to pick up the pace

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spring break came early for the K-State women's tennis team, but after a nearly two-week break, the Wildcats are ready to get back into competition.

K-State will play four dual matches in the next eight days, beginning with a match against Utah today in Salt Lake City and another against Brigham Young Saturday in Provo, Utah.

While it's a tight schedule, coach Steve Bietau said he welcomes the change of pace.

The team will be able to identify problems and make adjustments on a daily basis, Bietau said.

"I'm ready to play two matches in a weekend and start getting a string of matches back-to-back, because that's where you can really start to make some progress," Bietau said. "You can play a match, adjust, and really start to build on some things."

Doubles will be one area where changes might be made this weekend.

After Texas Tech swept K-State in doubles Feb. 5, the pairs have been a point of emphasis during the last two weeks of practice.

The doubles teams will see how much the extra work has paid off this weekend, sophomore Olga Klimova said.

"We were working on our doubles because we got swept there by Texas Tech and (we are) focused on concentrating on the game," Klimova said. "As the week went on, we were getting better, but now we will see in Utah."

While doubles have been an issue, the solution to the problem is not changing partners, Bietau said.

"I think the danger is you start to think the answer to playing together is finding a new partner," Bietau said. "At this point, I don't think that is the issue."

The doubles teams, formed at the Georgia Invitational on Jan. 20-22, are still becoming familiar with one other, sophomore Fernanda Da Valle said.

"You must work everyday on doubles to get better and know each other and understand what we are supposed to do on the court," Da Valle said. "We need to play the same game and help each other out."

The Wildcats will be playing indoors this weekend. K-State struggled with the conditions they faced against Texas Tech, with wind gusts up to 40 mph.

K-State also will face a new challenge in the high altitude of Utah, where the ball travels differently.

The way to address the elevation is by ignoring it, Bietau said.

The Wildcats then will travel to Tulsa, Okla., on Thursday before wrapping up the week Feb. 25 with a home match against the Wichita State Shockers.

Bietau hopes the Wildcats will have a different look by the end of the eight days.

"My hope is eight days from now we will look like a different team," Bietau said. "We're going to try to start to eliminate mistakes."

THOMAS | All-Pro linebacker led vaunted Kansas City defense

the 1990s as it was on offense under Vermeil.

Thomas was the poster-child of KC's vaunted D, which consistently ranked among the league's elite. Opposing blockers were scared of facing him because he made them look silly.

Thomas focused on one thing every time he stepped on the football field: sack the quarterback.

He set an NFL record with seven sacks in one game against the Seattle Seahawks on Nov. 11, 1990.

Only one Chief (Jared Allen) had more sacks last season than Thomas had in that one game.

Thomas perfected the art Lawrence Taylor made famous as an outside linebacker. Granted, Thomas never could defend the run very well, but he didn't need to. He didn't get paid to stop the run.

Thomas finished the 1990 season with a team-record 20 sacks. By the time he died, he established Chiefs career records for sacks (126.5), safeties (3), fumble recoveries (18) and forced fumbles (45).

If he had played longer than 11 seasons, those numbers would have increased.

Thomas also was voted to nine-straight Pro Bowls — more than Hall-of-Famers Marcus Allen, Jack Youngblood, Howie Long, Eric Dickerson, Jim Kelly, Troy Aikman, Lynn Swan, Steve Young and Joe Montana, among others.

As hard as Thomas tried to succeed on the field, he tried even harder off the field. Sure, there were rumors of late-night parties, but Thomas was respected throughout the league as a hard worker and a community activist.

He unselfishly gave money to various charitable events and started a program for poverty-stricken children called the Third and Long Foundation.

For his generosity, Thomas was named the NFL's Man of the Year in 1993.

On the field, Thomas' primary downfall was his team's inability to get to a Super Bowl. Though he helped Kansas City compile a 114-76-2 regular-season record and two 13-3 seasons from 1988-1999, the Chiefs never quite earned a spot under football's biggest spotlight.

Of the six 2006 Hall-of-Fame inductees announced on Feb. 4 — quarterback Troy Aikman, linebacker Harry Carson, coach/announcer John Madden, quarterback Warren Moon, defensive lineman Reggie White and tackle Rayfield Wright — only Moon never appeared in a Super Bowl.

Ultimately, this might have led to Thomas' Hall of Fame oversight.

president, Harlan said.

Elections Commissioner Tanner Banion said the filing deadline is strictly enforced.

"No exceptions will be made, because candidates have had plenty of time to file," he said. "I've heard of some candidates winning seats by write-ins, so it is rare but possible."

The primary election, where presidential candidate pairs are narrowed to two, begins at 8 a.m. Feb. 28 and ends at 6 p.m. March 1. The general election begins at 8 a.m. March 7 and ends at 6 p.m. March 8.

Candidates are required to attend one mandatory information meeting. The meetings are at 4 p.m. Monday and Tuesday in Union 212.

Student Body President Michael Burns said the time commitment for senators is an average of one and a half to four hours a week.

"Being in student government allows you to work on any issue affecting the student body that you believe needs to be addressed," Burns said.

university publications and co-chair of the redesign project.

Through these tests, Morrow said, designers were able to see how users navigate the site and how or if they're able to find the information they were looking for. In K-State's current system, Erdwien said, the information is too fragmented.

"Right now we're too divided up into little categories," Erdwien said. "We're trying to pull all the various elements together. The long-term vision is to consolidate various K-State Web site applications into one consistent web presence."

Once the system is in place, the Web design team is also planning on implementing a new sign-in system. Once students have signed in, they will be able to access KATS, Webmail, e-profile and K-State Online easily. This system, however, will not be in effect for at least another month.

will only make the situation worse. He said it will harm the student further because they are denied an education, and it reduces the chance of them ever getting the education.

"The previous provision hurts the individual and the society as a whole by reducing economic productivity and increasing crime," he said.

He said the SSDP is urging the department of education to enact the new provision as soon as possible because students with past convictions would be able to move on with their lives.

"This only hurts the good students," he said. "You have to keep a certain grade point average to keep aid anyway, so the student that sells drugs and never goes to class or studies won't have it anyway. This allows the hard-working, determined students to get the education they deserve."

Sondra Turnquist, junior in elementary education, said since it's a past offense, students should be given a second chance.

She said the new law would be a deterrent for students to stop using drugs while in school.

She said she doesn't know if K-State has a high population of people who use drugs, but she said she was sure it will affect the university in some manner.

"As for whether or not summer semester counts, even though you aren't enrolled, you are still a student," she said. "You don't quit being a student once you go home. You will be one until you graduate."

jump in 21 of his 30 indoor meets during his Wildcat career. His best jump this season was a jump of 7 feet, 4.25 inches during the KSU-KU-MU Triangular.

Another record-breaking Wildcat this season was Lisi Maurer, who ran the 60-meter hurdles with a time of 8.30 at the Husker Invite seconds to break her own school record. Her previous record was 8.32 at the Big 12 Championships in 2004.

Sophomore Morgan Bonds won her second straight 600-yard run title with a time of 1:23.35 at the Husker Invitational. Senior Lamar Garrett set a career-best with a high jump of 7 feet, .25 inches. It was the first time he had cleared seven feet in the event.

Six Wildcats stayed on the www.trackwire.com "Dandy Dozen" for the fifth week. Seniors Coby Cost, Lancaster, Smith and freshman Scott Sellers appeared on the men's Dozen and Eveland and Thomas made the listing for the women.

After the KSU Open this weekend, the team will head into the Big 12 Indoor Championships in Lincoln, Neb., at the Bob Devaney Sports Center.

Meningitis vaccine required this fall

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Starting next fall, K-State will conform to new regulations that require all students living in residence halls to get a meningitis vaccination shot or sign a legally binding waiver.

"The Kansas State Board of Regents passed the bill," said Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene Health Center. "Students can choose not to take the shot, but they are required to sign a waiver. We will be working with the housing department and tracking residents to see who has complied."

According to Meningitis.org, meningitis can kill in hours.

The two types of meningitis, viral and bacterial, cause inflammation of the lining around the brain and spinal cord. Viral meningitis is uncomfortable and almost never life-threatening, while bacterial meningitis is more serious and can be caused by many different bacteria.

Septicaemia is the blood poisoning form of the disease.

Together, the two are known as Pharmacies' prescription costs vary

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Prescriptions range in cost from different pharmacies for several reasons, said Ron Riley, pharmacist at Candlewood Health Mart Pharmacy, 3254 Kimball Ave.

"We buy things for similar prices," Riley said. "You get different amounts by figuring off of average wholesale price. Everyone has a different approach to how much they want to charge."

Riley said he uses a pricing system that suggests prices for prescriptions based on research. If he thinks the suggested price is too high, he overrides the program and charges what he thinks is fair. The popularity of a drug also can affect pricing.

"You want to be more competitive with the prices on high profile drugs," Riley said. "You make more money on lower-profile drugs, but you don't want to be too high on them because people do price shop."

Lafene Pharmacy is able to offer low-cost prescriptions to students through a government process.

Student dies in car crash early Sunday

Watt
K-STATE STUDENT

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State student died early Sunday morning when she was ejected from the vehicle she was riding in, according to a news release from the Riley County Police Department.

Sarah Watt, 23, junior in life sciences, was pronounced dead at about 3:30 a.m. at the scene of a single-vehicle accident in the 1700 block of Kimball Avenue, according to the release. She was not wearing a seat belt.

The driver of the vehicle was Mark Duane Martin Jr., 21, of Manhattan.

According to the RCPD, the vehicle was westbound on Kimball when it veered from the road and hit the guard rail.

The vehicle returned to the road and stopped in the westbound lanes of traffic.

The case is still under investigation. Authorities believe alcohol was involved in the accident.

Sarah's mother, Susan Watt, is an adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences' dean's office. That is how Pat Bosco, dean of student life, met Sarah when she was in high school.

"I had the pleasure of knowing Sarah as early as her junior year," he said. "She was bright, articulate and full of life. This is a tremendous loss to the entire university and the community."

Sarah's father, John Watt,

Wamego, Kan., said the family is dealing with the tragedy as best it can.

"We're just taking it minute by minute," he said.

John said the family is still determining the specifics of a memorial service.

John said his daughter enjoyed K-State and he hopes everyone remembers her for who she was.

"Remember the good times," he said.

Going Underground

Underground Railroad has local ties

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sixteen students viewed historic sites from the Underground Railroad on Saturday in Wabaunsee County.

The tour had three parts: Africa before American Slavery, Slavery and the Underground Railroad and Legacies from the Time Period. The tour guide was Richard Pitts, Manhattan resident and director of Wonder Workshop Children's Museum.

After visiting a memorial in Wabaunsee, Kan., the group traveled to the Beecher Bible and Rifle Church, the first integrated church in Kansas.

The church was dedicated in May 1862. The money used to build the church was donated by Henry Ward Beecher, brother of Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Peter Wetzel, Strong Complex multicultural assistant, organized the event in honor of Black History Month. Wetzel said Pitts and the tour were intriguing.

"The information he gave - not

Tour guide Richard Pitts speaks to the 16 students on the Underground Railroad tour in the Beecher Bible and Rifle Church, the first integrated church in Kansas.

just on the railroad but on the history of Africa and life in general - was interesting," Wetzel, junior in elementary education, said. "It shows how this history has been excluded from history classes."

Pitts said most people do not know what the oldest civilization in the world is.

"The oldest complete civilization, the one with written records, was the Egyptian civilization," he said. "It was going before Rome was built and had written records, schools and doctors."

However, Pitts said every civilization had to be different.

"How do we model our own civilization if we don't step outside of the box?" he asked the group.

There were three main reasons for the slavery, Pitts said.

"Slavery was a product of war, debt and crimes," he said. "With ancient slavery, though, the slaves had rights. With modern slavery, there are no rights, and they aren't human beings."

Pitts said what the families around Wabaunsee did was very important.

"They started this community, and they broke the chains of slavery," he said. "They came here and sacrificed life to make a statement that life is special."

After leaving the church, the group visited a graveyard where more than 60 Civil War veterans are buried. They also visited a house that was used as an Underground Station and a memorial at the top of Mount Mitchell.

Pitts, who has researched the Underground Railroad in Kansas since the early 1990s, said giving the tour was important to him.

"I wanted to find out my family history and where I came from," he said.

David Small, Haymaker Hall multicultural assistant, said going on the tour was personal for him.

"I was really interested to see the path that history took," Small, senior in accounting, said.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

Jackpot winner unknown

LINCOLN, Neb. — Someone, somewhere held the only winning ticket for the record $365 million Powerball jackpot, but likely wasn't in a rush to come forward, Nebraska lottery officials said Sunday. The only winning jackpot ticket from Saturday for the multistate lottery was sold at a U-Stop convenience store in Lincoln, Nebraska, Lottery spokesman Brian Rocky said.

Banned coach

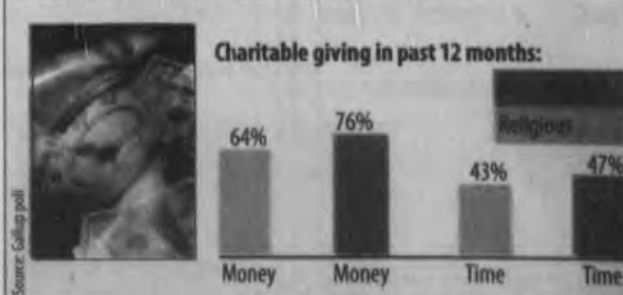

VIENNA, Austria — Walter Mayer, the banned Austrian ski coach who presence at the Olympics touched off anti-doping raids and an IOC investigation, was taken into protective custody after crashing his car into a police barrier Sunday evening to end a bizarre chase. Mayer was not injured in the accident, police said.

Russia hosts talks

MOSCOW — The spotlight on Tehran's nuclear program shifts Monday to Moscow, where Iranian officials are to hold talks on a proposal to move their uranium enrichment to Russia in a bid to ease fears that the Islamic republic will develop atomic weapons. Iran said Sunday it will consider Moscow's proposal if certain provisions are met.

Davis claims 1,000-meter speedskating gold

Courtesy art

TURIN, Italy — Say what you want about Shani Davis. Call him a trailblazer. Accuse him of selfishness. Snicker at him for being a momma's boy.

Just don't forget this: He's also an Olympic champion.

Davis became the first black athlete to claim an individual gold medal in Winter Olympic history Saturday, winning the 1,000-meter speedskating race.

ANNAN WANTS GITMO SHUTDOWN

NEW YORK — United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Thursday said the United States should close the prison at Guantanamo Bay for terror suspects as soon as possible, backing a key conclusion of a U.N.-appointed independent panel.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan rejected the call to shut the camp, saying the military treats all detainees humanely and "these are dangerous terrorists that we're talking about."

WHITTINGTON RELEASED

CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas — Harry Whittington said Friday he was sorry for what Dick Cheney and his family have "had to go through" after the vice president shot him in a weekend hunting accident.

The 78-year-old Bush-Cheney campaign donor spoke briefly to reporters upon his release from a Corpus Christi hospital, but he took no questions.

ESCAPEE MAY HAVE NEW LOOK

TOPEKA — Police searching for 27-year-old John Manard said the red-headed, convicted murderer might look different now. Police say after his escape from Lansing, Kan., prison last Sunday, Manard could have easily dyed his hair and shaved his head and beard.

Manard escaped from Lansing Correctional Facility on Sunday inside a dog crate in the back of a van driven by a 48-year-old woman who's also missing.

NEW ABU GHRAIB PHOTOS

SYDNEY, Australia — New images showing Iraqis abused by U.S. guards at Abu Ghraib prison three years ago threatened Wednesday to inflame public anger already running high over footage of British soldiers beating youths in southern Iraq.

Images of naked prisoners, some bloodied and lying on the floor, were taken about the same time as earlier photos that triggered a worldwide scandal and led to military trials and prison sentences for several lower-ranking American soldiers.

MURDER PLEA

OLATHE, Kan. — For two decades, the police in Olathe, Kan., were convinced that a male student at the local Bible college had conspired with the secretary to the dean of students to kill her husband.

But after years of denials, Mark Mangelsdorf, 45, of Pelham, N.Y., pleaded guilty to second-degree murder in a Kansas court on Monday in the bludgeoning of David Harmon. He faces a sentence of 10 to 20 years, though prosecutors said he could be eligible for parole in about five years.

Hoffman, Bahadori emphasize building relationships

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Building Relationships" is the theme that Amanda Hoffman, senior in speech, and Amir Bahadori, senior in mechanical engineering, are centering their campaign around as presidential and vice presidential candidates, respectively.

The candidates' platform focuses on university and private sector cooperation, cohesiveness, continued support and informing the student body of where their money is going.

The pair said university and private sector cooperation is a main concern. They said they would like to see better relationships established with employers to help students get better jobs when they do graduate.

"Whenever students graduate and go on to work, the companies are benefitting immensely from their education," Bahadori said. "So we thought if they could start to invest early in students and then from there help themselves."

Cohesiveness is another factor their campaign addresses. They said they hope to help the many organizations on campus become more connected with each other.

"One big thing we know is that there are over 400 organizations at K-State, and we want to make sure there are connections being made with those organizations through Student Senate," Hoffman said. "We want to implement new programs for that."

The candidates said they also want to focus on continuing support for tuition, textbooks and parking. Hoffman said that these are issues that are not going to go away, so they need to be handled.

"Obviously, that is such a big concern to students, and it needs to get taken care of," she said. "We want to help continue that process."

The pair also want to ensure students are aware of what their money is being used for and how they can take full advantage of student activities.

"A lot of times freshmen and especially transfer students do not realize what benefits they can receive," Hoffman said. "You are paying for it, so you might as well get benefits from it."

Hoffman and Bahadori said they are able to offer a different point of view on different situations.

"We come from different perspectives and are able to analyze situations and come up with the best solution," Bahadori said.

Kansas team defeats K-State Chess Club in schools' 1st meeting

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mind games, time pressure and tactical errors summarize Saturday's chess clash between K-State and the University of Kansas. In terms of points, KU won a close match, 7-5.

"This is the first time in the history of the chess club that we played against KU, and it was great," said Kenton Born, president of the K-State Chess Club and senior in computer science.

Five students founded the K-State Chess Club in 1997 under the guidance of faculty adviser Ron Madl, administrator in the department of grain science and industry.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Bruce Law, professor of physics, competes in a K-State versus KU chess tournament Saturday in the K-State Student Union.

Saturday's match was a friendly battle of the brains. Six players in each camp were ranked first through sixth. Each player played two matches against the same opponent. Teams got one point for every win and half a point for each draw. The maximum duration of each match was three hours.

"We got ahead early and now our odds of winning are high," said Kyle Camarda, KU Chess Club's faculty adviser and professor in the Department of Chemical and Petroleum Engineering.

"We are more casual players, like old men in the park," said Raymond Paul, K-State Chess Club president and senior in physical science. "The KU players were more aggressive. They definitely had more pizzazz."

Ricky Soi, Paul's opponent and graduate student in aerospace engineering, defeated Paul despite Paul's tactics for surviving the two games.

A time crunch jeopardized both of Born's matches against Kyle Sciolaro, sophomore in political science at KU.

"Anticipating the time trouble Kenton had in his first match, I played the second game more aggressively," Sciolaro said. "That put pressure on him. He took 10 minutes for his third move."

Mory Mort, another chess contender, is one of the founding members of the K-State chess club. Mort gave the K-State team its two wins.

"I stayed on the attack from the beginning and dominated the game," Mort said.

Board 1 consisted of a match between chess veterans John Schuller of K-State and Camarda.

Schuller, who lost the first game, came back to draw the second one.

"Chess is all about give and take," Schuller said. "Very early in the first game I made a tactical error and my opponent took full advantage of my weak move."

Schuller, who is the highest-rated player on the K-State team, has an expert rating with the U.S. Chess Federation.

"I haven't played in 13 to 14 years now, so I'm not in the full strength that my rating would indicate," he said. "I need to dust off the rust and get back."

The Board 6 match between Henry Elmore, a soldier at Fort Riley, and Karl Eisert, graduate student in petroleum engineering, was close.

A few miscalculations and a queen in trouble caused Eisert's defeat in the match, which lasted a little less than 90 minutes.

"This is the first time I'm playing 90-minute games and I haven't been to a tournament since high school," Eisert said. "It was a great match."

The longest and most complicated matches of the day were played between Bruce Law, professor of physics at K-State, and Samer Adra, junior in computer science at KU. The match resulted in one win for KU and a draw.

KU led at halftime, 4-2.

The KU team invited K-State to come to Lawrence in the fall for another tournament.

"This has been a fascinating experience," Camarda said. "It was very competitive and we had a great time."

The K-State annual chess tournament has been scheduled for April 29. For the first time this year, there will be both a USCF rated and non-USCF rated tournament. The USCF rated tournament is only for USCF members.

The Chess Club meets on Wednesdays from 6 to 10 p.m. in Union 206.

The members play open chess, where they practice and work to improve their games. There is also a higher level of instruction which includes game analysis and exploration.

Whether it's a passion to teach or write software programs for online chess, all the members have a common passion to flex their brains and relax at the same time.

"The thing that I love about chess is that there is no luck in it," Born said. "It is pure analysis and strategy. It is your brain versus theirs."

Sculptors create scrap iron art

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sculpture students and professors from Arizona, New Mexico, Georgia, Nebraska and Missouri were at K-State Friday for an iron pour, a process that dates back to the 18th century.

"The process was perfected in England in the 1780s during the industrial revolution," said Dan Hunt, associate professor in art.

Pieces of scrap iron are melted and cast into molds. The machines themselves are fueled by coke, a type of coal, Hunt said.

The molds were designed mostly by students either from K-State or the other universities in attendance, but the students said they got more out of the experience than just a sculpture.

"It's an incredible amount of work," Hunt said. "It unifies groups of people because you have to work as a team and it creates a really nice social environment to share ideas."

Students in Julie Gibbs' 3-D design class were among those designing molds. Usually Gibbs required students to make masks out of papier-mâché, but she gave this semester's class an opportunity to make their masks out of iron, she said.

"They seemed to enjoy it," Gibbs, graduate student in fine arts, said. "I'm sure they'll be very excited about the results."

Martha Moore-Westbrook, graduate student in fine arts, participated in the pour for her second time. Moore-Westbrook cast a 75-pound statue in the shape of an ancient coral.

"I am using man-made material to point out the building blocks of life," Moore-Westbrook said, referring to the piece, which is part of a series she is working on.

TO THE POINT Mandatory vaccinations will protect students

One brief moment of discomfort can truly be a lifesaver.

With the recent announcement by the Kansas State Board of Regents that students living in residence halls must receive a meningitis vaccination or sign a waiver, K-State health officials, by enforcing the policy, have taken a step in ensuring students' health and well-being. And when one examines the symptoms and effects of the illness, ranging from a rash to possibly death, it is obvious there is no reason to avoid the vaccination.

Although the policy will ensure health and safety among the students in K-State's residence halls, those who live off-campus are not assured this safety. All K-Staters would be wise to take a few minutes, visit Lafene Health Center or Mercy Regional Health Center and protect themselves and their peers from the dangerous, sometimes deadly, effects of meningitis. Since only a fraction of K-State students live in the residence halls, the likelihood of infection among off-campus students is still high.

By adhering to the new policy, students will protect themselves and one another from a virus that has the potential to take lives. Students should educate themselves about meningitis and its effects today and they'll enjoy good health tomorrow.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Alter ego

Cartoon teaches us about humanity's faults

Dec. 31, 2005, marked 10 years that America has lived without its 6-year-old best friend and alter ego.

Calvin, the spiky-haired, tiger-toting, id-driven brainchild of American genius Bill Watterson, spent 10 years saying and doing all the things we were too inhibited to say or do ourselves.

Although he only appeared in comic books and newspapers, Calvin's worldview and troubled-6-year-old-meets-Taoist-philosopher persona made him one of the great characters of modern American literature. He's a mosaic of all the worst parts of each of us. Here are just a few of the lessons we've learned from "Calvin and Hobbes."

JACI
BOYDSTON

FAMILIES SHOULD BE DEMOCRACIES

Calvin's father, whose idea of fun is waking up at 4 a.m. to ride his bike in the dead of winter, is a constant source of frustration, so to keep him in check, Calvin conducts regular public opinion polls on the office of Dad.

Like so many of us, he is convinced the parenting he receives is inadequate, at one time loudly demanding, "What assurance do I have that your parenting isn't screwing me up?" Wouldn't we all like a similar guarantee?

HAPPINESS ISN'T GOOD ENOUGH

In fact, Calvin demands euphoria.

Despite comfortable surroundings, an amazing best friend and a backyard that rivals a national park, Calvin wants more.

Not only that, he wants it handed to him on a silver platter, saying, "Why should I have to WORK for everything!? It's like saying I don't deserve it!" Some days, I agree wholeheartedly.

Because of the private nature of Calvin's creator, we're not likely to learn any more lessons in the future.

According to an October

2005 Maxim article, Watterson has requested that no fan mail be forwarded to him.

He doesn't seem interested in communicating with the many people whose lives he's touched, nor does he seem interested in making money off of his genius (despite the millions that could be made from a Hobbes doll alone, Watterson refuses to subject "Calvin and Hobbes" to merchandising).

I like to think that Watterson just figures Calvin has said all he needs to say.

Calvin was a 6-year-old when I was in diapers, and he's still a 6-year-old today, and that's his charm.

No matter how much he teaches the rest of us about ourselves and our own behavior, he refuses to learn anything himself.

Miller unfit to represent America in Turin

The American ski team hasn't done well this year at the Olympics, and part of that problem is our so-called golden boy, Bode Miller.

Bode Miller is the skier the media has talked about so much. He's what you would call a bad boy.

He admitted to CBS's "60 Minutes" that he has, in the past, skied an event while drunk. He told Newsweek he didn't really want to compete in the Olympics and that people have seen him drinking shots and beer in between runs at the Olympics.

If you ask me, from every rebellious thing he's done, he would be great to party with but I wouldn't want him on my team.

Sure he lives for skiing, but if the guy isn't motivated to do his best, he probably won't. Just three days ago, in the super-G event, he failed to take a turn properly and ended up skiing into a gate.

MEGAN GREEN

Last week he was disqualified from the men's combined for straddling a gate, and he doesn't care. He's just happy he doesn't have to get off the mountain to get the medal in Torino.

I don't know if he actually realizes it, but he's on a team — for his country. So, basically he is representing all of us and, let's be honest, doing a really bad job of it.

So much was expected of him and he can't even place in one run, let alone actually do the run correctly. He is getting paid so much, but being responsible for nothing.

I wonder if he even tried to make it to practice in the weeks leading up to the Olympics?

Maybe not, because he was too hung over or still drunk.

I vote we take him off the team. There has to be at least one person who loves to ski and takes it seriously enough that they wouldn't be drunk going down a mountain. I think American citizens expect that — a skier who actually practices and wants to do well.

If that is your job, and if you don't do it correctly, you'll get fired.

That's precisely what should happen to Bode. If we got rid of him and had some actual teamwork, maybe we could start winning some of these races.

If Kansas is going to become it's own country, I'd be damn glad I wasn't an international student.

Frank, I love you.

Yeah, I think the reason why the men's team keeps losing is because Woodridge is talking bad about the team. Wasn't happy about the close losses, so now he comes back and we get a big loss.

Where's my goat?

How can Woodridge say that we don't have a good team right now when most of our losses could have went either way?

Ad hoc chorus performs 'Requiem'

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dressed in black to symbolize mourning, the community ad hoc choir performed Fauré's "Requiem" Saturday night at the Manhattan Arts Center.

The event was co-produced by the Manhattan Arts Center and Side by Side Theatre and Music.

This year's choir had 18 singers, including two soloists from K-State. William Wingfield, instructor of music and staff accompanist, played the piano.

"Just to do things differently, this year we decided to sing Fauré's 'Requiem' instead of Handel's 'Messiah,'" said Penny Senften, executive director of the MAC, who sang alto for the rendition.

"This is a lovely piece of music and is shorter and easier," she said.

Requiem means a mass for the deceased person.

Several singers in the choir had previous experience singing requiems and Fauré's music, but the choir had just two rehearsals before Saturday's performance.

"It is challenging to conduct an ad hoc choir because there is very little time," said Reginald Pittman, associate professor in music and choir conductor. "All the singers have different types and levels of experience."

Dick Seaton, who sang tenor, said, unlike most requiems, Fauré's was not grave and was almost welcoming of death.

"This a short, joyful and melodic piece of music," Seaton, university attorney, said.

Mel Cottom said he played with symphony orchestras and said Fauré's requiem was very different.

"We love our musical evenings, and we know many people on the choir," Mel Cottom, Manhattan residents said. "It was wonderful and extremely peaceful."

Drew Horton, senior in music education, said it was his first time singing at Manhattan Arts Center and singing a requiem. Horton said preparation was difficult.

"I had to learn my part and prepare my voice for it," Horton said. "The solo was a long piece and required a lot of stamina."

Professor appears in documentary

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Robert Linder, distinguished professor of history, will offer his perspective on anti-American sentiment abroad in a former student's documentary film.

Linder is one of several scholars who will appear in the new documentary "America Non Grata," directed by former student Alex Berkley. Berkley, who now resides in Paris, is a Salina native and graduate of the University of Kansas. He first met Linder while participating in an overseas study trip led by the professor in 1985. Berkley approached Linder about appearing in the documentary almost 20 years later, during summer 2004.

Berkley said the time Linder has spent living abroad made him an appealing source for the documentary.

"Living that long abroad exposes you to the reoccurring themes of anti-Americanism and the various related arguments," Berkley said. "It's really only after years abroad that you develop the ability to see the U.S. and its culture through foreign eyes."

Linder said he was intrigued by Berkley's project and gladly agreed to participate in the film.

"I was interested in the project, not only because Alex is a friend and a very bright young man, but also because I thought the idea worthwhile," he said.

"America Non Grata" focuses on how the rest of the world views the United States in light of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Berkley conducted spontaneous street interviews with citizens of major European capitals like London; Belgrade, Serbia; and Athens, Greece, about their perception of the United States.

He also interviewed scholars familiar with the topic and several Kansans to assess how United States citizens believe they are viewed by foreigners. Linder said that while the film is available to a worldwide audience, he considered the project most vital to American survival.

"Most Americans are so inward looking that they often do not know or do not seem to care what the rest of the world thinks of us," he said. "That will be fatal if it continues."

Lori Bergen, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, also is a former student and friend of Linder. She said his extensive historical knowledge provided background for the film's events and themes.

"He is really brilliant in many ways at taking the long view," she said. "He understands and can explain the significance of events because he has such a sense of where those events fit in a historical context."

Bergen said she admired Berkley for making "America Non Grata" without any filmmaking training or experience.

"In some ways he is like a citizen journalist," she said. "He saw a story he wanted to tell and went out and did it."

Bergen said she plans to show the film in a course she is teaching this semester and hopes other professors might do the same.

Linder's involvement in a former student's project did not surprise Sue Zschoche, professor and head of the Department of History.

She said Linder cares about his students and keeps in touch with them even after they graduate from college and start their careers.

"I tease him all the time," Zschoche said. "Students take him to baseball games, and he writes literally hundreds of letters a year just keeping up with former students. The man goes through a lot of stamps."

Couples play local version of game show

Seamus McVey, Manhattan resident, thrusts his sign into the air to show that his wife, Kelly, gave the correct answer to a question while competing in "With This Ring, I Z' Wed."

Manhattan radio station KACZ-FM 96.3 revived a TV dating show Saturday at the Manhattan Town Center.

Bill Michaels, 96.3's program director, said the live dating contest was inspired by the 1960s TV show "The Newlywed Game."

"It is the wedding season, and we want to give listeners the opportunities to participate for gifts," Michaels said. "I like the wedding show, and we thought it'd be a neat idea to put up the show."

Michaels said the radio show had promotions for six weeks in six locations before the game. Anyone in a relationship was eligible to participate.

"We had a lot of people showing up early and trying to get registered," Michaels said.

The dating contest mimicked the TV show by testing the spouses' mutuality. The women were sent away while their male partners answered to questions, and then the women returned with their own answers. The winners were the couple who had the most identical answers.

Contestants Shane Thoreson and Laura Buessing, both seniors in kinesiology, said they played the show for both the fun and the prizes.

"I thought it was a blast," Thoreson said. "It was fun to be up onstage."

Their prizes included a dinner for two at Whiskey Creek and movie passes.

Seamus and Kelly McVey, married for two years, won the game and a $1,500 diamond ring and gift certificates.

Kelly said she and her husband went to the contest for fun and wanted to know how much they knew each other.

Seamus, an active duty military member, said he also went to the show for patronage reasons.

"I listen to Z96.3 all the time," he said.

Michaels said the show's success was particularly due to the ideal location - the Manhattan Town Center.

"This is the perfect place to play," he said. "It's an open place and it is really fit."

Michaels said the show was successful and he is considering it as an annual event.

"It went really well. People in the town center stopped to watch," he said. "I had a good time hosting."

LINCOLN, Neb. — K-State knew it was coming. With just seconds left in overtime and the game tied at 62-62, Nebraska's Kiera Hardy dribbled through the lane and, with K-State defenders all around, hit a jumper to give the Cornhuskers a 64-62 win against the Wildcats on Saturday in Lincoln.

"We knew they were going to get some kind of penetration to the rim," Coach Deb Patterson said. "Unfortunately, we let her (Hardy) get a little deep, and she stepped up and made a really big shot."

"Certainly, it would have been our desire to make that a 12-footer instead of a 4- or 5-footer. Even though she was pressed outside the lane, it was what we anticipated."

For the second straight game, the Wildcats (17-7, 7-6 Big 12 Conference) were not able to hang on to a first-half lead, and in doing so, are in the midst of their first two-game losing streak since losing to Missouri and Texas A&M back-to-back earlier in the season. K-State is now 0-3 in overtime games this year.

"This was a big game for us, and we had a lead again, and we weren't able to capitalize on it, and it's something that we are really going to have to work through," freshman Shalee Lehning said.

In the first half, K-State jumped out to an early 14-4 lead with the help of the K-State added a new word to its game description Saturday.

Missing in the post-game conference were words like "frustrating," "disappointing" and "I don't know," and instead, in the Wildcats' 72-60 win against Oklahoma State, the word "complete" emerged.

Perhaps it was the team meeting the players organized on Thursday, during which they looked to regroup and attempted to pinpoint what has been going wrong for the Cats (14-9, 5-7 Big 12 Conference). Or maybe it was the timeout Coach Jim Wooldridge called 1 minute, 20 seconds into the second half. After those 30 seconds, K-State began climbing its way out of an 11-point deficit to eventually take the lead at 10:26, 44-43, off junior Akeem Wright's free throw.

Reasons aside, K-State showed up on both ends of the court on Saturday, boasting three players in double digits and taming Colorado's (17-6, 7-5) offense, allowing the Buffaloes to shoot only 34.4 percent from the field.

"We turned it on in the second half," said Wright, who had 17 points, seven rebounds and five assists against the Buffaloes. "We turned around and played like we played at KU. This is how we're going to have to play every game."

Indeed, everything about the

The utter confusion of the Winter Olympics

Did you see the Russian pairs figure skaters Tatiana Totmianina and Maxim Marinin win the gold medal last week at the Olympics?

You didn't? What about American speedskater Shani Davis winning the 1,000-meter race to become the first African-American to capture an individual gold at the Winter Olympics?

That's a negative, too, huh?

What's that you say? No right-minded person is watching these Winter Olympics?

How can that be?

MICHAEL ASHFORD

These are the Olympics. It's the one time where countries from all across the globe come together and compete and try to out-sport each other, not out-kill.

So why don't people watch the Winter Olympics? Quite simply, no one can understand how they work.

The Winter Olympics, for whatever reason, aren't simply about who can go faster, higher or longer.

Instead, they have found every possible way to confuse the viewer.

In figure skating, the average viewer isn't going to realize the difference between a triple Salchow and a triple-toe loop. All they really know is that if you fall down, you get a lower score.

It's too awkward to turn to your buddy and say,

Women golfers open season

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's golf team opens its spring season today at the Central District Invitational in Parrish, Fla., where players will square off against 13 teams in three rounds.

Coach Kristi Knight said practices have gone well, particularly because of the good weather in January.

"We've had good days to practice," she said. "I've had them play a lot, and our main priority has been the short game. We've had more opportunity to play this year than in past years."

Three of the players traveling to Florida, juniors Katy Heffel and Helene Robert and sophomore Hailey Mireles, have competed in this tournament. The other two players — sophomore Kali Quick and freshman Krista Nelson — are unfamiliar with the event.

Nelson was a redshirt freshman in the fall, but when sophomore Michelle Regan hurt the medial collateral ligament in her knee, Nelson's redshirt was pulled.

The invitational will be at River Wilderness Golf and Country Club.

The 18-hole course is a par-72 that was voted a top-50 course in Florida by Florida Golfer Magazine.

K-State will face opponents from Michigan State, Baylor, Texas Tech, Missouri, Nebraska and Kansas.

Heffel said she's looking forward to playing.

"It's going to be a lot of fun, and we're going to go to a lot of fun places," she said.

Heffel said she also is geared up for the Florida weather.

"It'll be nice to play somewhere where it's 75 degrees every day," she said.

Mireles said she agreed with Heffel that the weather is a plus, but said it won't be a distraction from the competition.

"It's going to be nice weather," she said. "However, it's going to be just like every other tournament. You have to play well when you get there."

During the fall season, the Cats placed second at the Chip-N-Club Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., and third at the Marilyn Smith/Sunflower Invitational at Colbert Hills.

After the Central District Invitational, the Wildcats will travel to the Texas A&M Mo'morial at Bryan, Texas, before going to the Dr. Donnis Thompson Invitational in Honolulu, Hawaii. Rounding out the year will be the Mountain View Collegiate in Tucson, Ariz., the Susie Maxwell Classic in Norman, Okla., and the Big 12 Conference Championship in Lincoln, Neb.

Knight said the team has a few goals for the spring season.

"We want to make it to postseason, obviously," she said. "We want to be competitive in every tournament. Mostly, I want the girls to play their game and not get caught up in things they can't control."

NBA | Wecker helps trio win shooting event

On Saturday, Tony Parker, Steve Kerr and San Antonio Star Kendra Wecker won the NBA All-Star Shooting Stars competition in record time, hitting six shots from various spots in 25.1 seconds.

There were four teams in the event, all composed of a current and former NBA player and one WNBA player.

The San Antonio team went 6-for-8 and Parker, the Spurs' guard who will play his first All-Star game Sunday, finished the round by banking in a half-court shot on his first try.

EQU | Equestrian team wins Sunday show

The K-State women's equestrian team finished up competition on Sunday at Washington University with its second-straight win as the Wildcats were the High Point Team with 42 points, 13 points better than second-place Northern Illinois.

Freshmen Dresden Sommer and senior Summer Hamil had strong performances as they tied for Reserve High Point Rider for the day.

The team accumulated 12 first-place finishes for the day.

"We did not dominate the flat classes like yesterday, but we still rode well," head coach Teresa Slough said. "We have a nice lead in our region. Now we need to go home, work hard and get ready for some tough competition in the postseason."

K-State's next competition will be Feb. 25, when it hosts two Western shows at Fox Creek Stables.

BKC | Martin named to NABC All-District team

K-State junior Cartier Martin was named to the National Association of Basketball Coaches (NABC) Division I All-District 12 second team on Friday in voting by its member coaches. He is now eligible for the association's All-America Team.

A native of Houston, Texas, Martin was one of 150 student-athletes from 15 districts across the country to be honored.

The team leader in both scoring (18.6) and rebounding (6.9), Martin also paced the squad in 10 other categories.

His current 18.6 points per game average is on track to be the best by a Wildcat since Askia Jones averaged 22.1 points during the 1993-94 season.

BBC | K-State wins 1, loses 1 in season opener

Oral Roberts scored two runs in the top of the seventh inning to erase a 1-0

K-State lead and added three insurance runs in the ninth for a 5-1 win Friday at Clay Gould Ballpark in Arlington, Texas. With the loss, the Cats dropped to 1-1 on the season.

Senior Adam Cowart got the nod for the Wildcats and after giving up two singles to open the game, the senior settled in and retired 10 of the next 12 batters he faced.

Cowart went 6.0 strong shutout innings, striking out eight and walking none in the no-decision.

On Thursday, senior Joe Roundy and freshman Byron Wiley each collected a career-high four hits, including home runs, as K-State broke out the offense in a 13-3 season-opening win against Texas-Arlington Thursday evening.

K-State collected 18 hits on the night, which included seven doubles and two homers, as the Wildcats gave Coach Brad Hill his first season-opening win with the Wildcats.

Roundy finished 4-for-5 with three runs and two RBI, and Wiley drove in five runs and scored two in his career debut night as a Wildcat.

Comedy show attempts to explain miscommunication that occurs when dating mixes with sex

"Sex Signals" is a provocative stage production that blends improvisation, humor and audience participation in an effort to engage college audiences in an honest discussion about sexual assault and date rape.

The show was part of Union Program Council's Afterhours program on Friday night in the K-State Student Union Forum Hall.

Lorenzo Matthews, UPC employee and graduate assistant adviser for Afterhours, said UPC brought "Sex Signals" to the Union as an educational program that would be both informational and entertaining for students.

"We saw videos and various press kits about the play," Matthews said. "We thought it would be a good, informational program that presents tough subjects like sexual assault and rape in a different way."

"Sex Signals" was created by Christian Murphy and Gail Stern, owners of Catharsis Productions, which is dedicated to creating educational programs that address social issues through theatrical media, Courtney Abbott, actor from the production company, said.

The play is a 75-minute performance consisting of two actors (one male, one female), two armless chairs and a stage.

The show begins by taking a humorous look at the awkwardness associated with dating. Each actor represents his or her sex's respective viewpoint on how social norms, mixed messages, unrealistic fantasies and false interaction can contribute to miscommunication in dating.

Then, through a semi-improvisational scene, the actors demonstrate how these miscommunications can lead to sexual assault, even between two well-intentioned individuals.

Kelly Brannin, junior in kinesiology, said Terry and Abbott were hilarious but also down-to-earth.

"They presented good factual information, controversial information, in a very funny way, but when it was necessary — like when they were talking about rape and sexual assault — they were able to take on a serious tone," Brannin said.

Abbott said she thinks the way "Sex Signals" is performed is a great way to raise interest and awareness about what constitutes sexual assault.

"We are trying to re-vamp the way lectures are presented," Abbott said. "By making it entertaining and interactive, we can engage the audience at a level they are more willing to think critically and interact. We aren't just talking at them or down to them."

TODAY Love Your Pet Day

Besides being President's Day, Feb. 20th also is Love Your Pet Day. People just love their pets, and today is an easy excuse to spend time with them and to give them special treats.

Whether it's a dog, a cat, a fish or your pet rock, give them lots of love and attention.

If you don't have a pet, maybe today is the day to adopt a pet. Take a trip to your local Humane Society and save an animal that needs you.

K-State men fight back to dominate Colorado

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With 17:30 remaining in K-State's game against Colorado on Saturday, most of the 9,768 fans at Bramlage Coliseum had started getting restless.

Moments earlier, sophomore guard Richard Roby nailed a 3-pointer to give Colorado an 11-point lead – its largest of the afternoon.

Meanwhile, K-State had failed to score a field goal in the previous eight minutes of action.

But the Wildcats, three days after suffering a 14-point loss to Texas Tech in Lubbock, Texas, ended their shooting slump and compiled an 8-0 run to tie the game at 41, bringing K-State fans to their feet.

"We had to find some heart, and we did," senior forward Dramane Diarra said of the comeback effort.

Junior guard Akeem Wright, whose wide-open dunk tied the game, then gave the Cats their first second-half lead on a left-handed layup with 10:27 remaining.

But K-State was just heating up.

During the next nine minutes, K-State extended its lead on the strength of Wright's defense and junior forward Cartier Martin's offense.

Wright limited Roby, who entered Saturday as Colorado's leading scorer at 18.6 points per game, to 2-of-8 from the field in the second half, including two air balls.

Roby finished with 14 points on 5-of-14 shooting and 2-of-9 from three-point range.

"I wasn't really saying anything to (Roby), but I think I was making him frustrated by fighting with him over those screens," Wright said. "I thought he did a pretty good job of getting open in the first half. I knew they were going to come to him more in the second half, and I didn't want to let him have a big game on me."

Martin, who struggled to score in the first half, broke out with 18 second-half points. K-State's leading scorer hit 8-of-8 free throws and finished with 21 points on 5-of-15 from the field.

Coach Jim Wooldridge said Martin has been frustrated with his recent shooting slump, but he responded well in the second half.

"We had basically a heart-to-heart talk with him during (halftime), and I think he responded very well," Wooldridge said. "He came out and competed as hard as he could."

Junior guard Mario Taybron's fast-break dunk with 1:37 remaining gave K-State a 17-point lead – its largest of the game.

In all, K-State compiled a 40-12 run in about 15 minutes of play en route to a 72-60 victory.

"We struggled a little bit, but we kept our composure and played as a team," Martin said.

"We got the job done in the end."

Wooldridge said the season, like Saturday's game, has had its share of ups and downs.

"These seasons, they're an emotional rollercoaster," Wooldridge said. "It never goes exactly like a young man plans it to go. We want the very best, but there are peaks and valleys. You have to deal with it."

Nebraska's Hardy heats up, torches Wildcats in 2nd half

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the first meeting between Nebraska and K-State, the Wildcats defeated the Cornhuskers in the confines of Bramlage Coliseum.

Husker guard Kiera Hardy, who averages more than 17 points per game, logged 35 minutes in that contest and connected for 14 points.

Saturday night's rematch in Lincoln, Neb., however, proved all Hardy needed was about 20 minutes of warmup time.

In the first half, Hardy netted only four points after being guarded closely by junior guard Twiggy McIntyre.

"I felt like I did a pretty good job on her the first half – made shots hard for her," McIntyre said.

The Wildcats entered the locker room with a 10-point, 27-17 lead. Coming out of the half, Hardy scored 10 points to tie her first-game point total.

Shortly thereafter, McIntyre fell into foul trouble.

Playing with four fouls forced her into changing how she played defense, she said.

"That's my bad as a defensive player getting little tic-tac fouls, and I think that kind of changed the nature of the game," she said. "It made me soft. It took me out of character."

After 40 minutes of play, the score was tied at 53.

During overtime, Hardy continued to demonstrate how dominant she can be.

To begin, Hardy drained two 3-pointers, adding six more points for the Cornhuskers in the first two-and-a-half minutes of overtime.

In contrast, the Wildcats were only able to score one point in the same amount of time.

"In critical segments of the game down the stretch, I thought that's when she was the most effective and when our mistakes were more costly with her," Coach Deb Patterson said.

"Once Hardy starts to feel it, you're in a lot of trouble. That's the kind of player she is. When it's hot, it's very, very hot."

Although K-State was unable to score early during overtime, the Wildcats were able to hit a couple of three-point shots to come back and tie the game again with one minute remaining.

However, with less than 10 seconds left, Hardy sealed the game for the Huskers with a driving shot to the basket that finalized the game at 64-62.

"We knew they were going to get some kind of penetration look to the rim," Patterson said.

"Unfortunately, we let her get a little deep. We still took her off the line of the lane, which I think is all you can hope for, but we let her get too deep."

K-State played two overtime periods before the one against Nebraska on Saturday and fell in both of them. Freshman forward Marlies Gipson said the women went into overtime wanting to prove they could win one of those close games.

Still, this was the second overtime game in which a big shot from the opponent kept K-State from adding another win.

"That shot at the end was clutch," Gipson said. "Another great shot at the end – there's nothing you can really do about it."

Lancaster ties school record as track team warms up for Big 12 meet

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The majority of the K-State track team used this weekend's KSU Open as a warmup for the upcoming Big 12 Indoor Championships, but senior Kyle Lancaster used it to tie a high-jump school record set by Percell Gaskins in 1993.

Lancaster turned in a height of 7 feet, 5 1/4 inches in dramatic fashion late in the day. The crowd surrounding the high-jump pit egged on the product of Fort Scott, Kan., and erupted in cheers when he finally cleared the height.

"I was happy with the high mark," he said. "I still have some stuff to work on, like in my approach, to put things together for conference."

Lancaster entered the weekend ranked second in the nation behind Andra Manson of Texas. His new height narrows the margin between the two to 1/4 inch.

Senior Breanna Eveland added another event title to the Wildcats' collection, winning her fifth-straight pole vault and her eighth of the season. The native of Grand Rapids, Mich., cleared 13 feet, 5 1/4 inches.

Eveland now has won 13 of her last 16 career meets, never finishing below 13 feet.

"I was just trying to fix some things up before we get into the Big 12 and nationals," she said. "There's not too much pressure today."

Lancaster

Another winner on Saturday was sophomore Laci Heller, who won the first event of the day in the women's weight throw with a throw of 65 feet, 9 1/2 inches.

Other Wildcats winning titles were junior Marnyka Honeycutt (200-meter run; 25.32), senior Shunte Thomas (600-yard run; 1:21.06), junior Lisi Maurer (60-meter hurdles; 8.37), junior Candice Mills (long jump; 18 feet, 9 1/4 inches), freshman Tevas Everett (600-yard run; 1:13.66), freshman Tevan Everett (800-meter run; 1:54.92), senior T.J. Staab (shot put; 59 feet, 9 3/4 inches) and senior Coby Cost (weight throw; 67 feet, 5 1/2 inches).

Coach Cliff Rovelto said he felt his team has enough depth to compete at the Big 12 Tournament.

"Having depth and having quality depth is one thing we're always striving to do," he said.

The team will travel to the Big 12 Indoor Championships this weekend in Lincoln, Neb., to compete against the other 11 members of the Big 12 Conference. Lancaster made clear his intentions for the meet.

"My goal is to win," he said. "I think our men's team is one of the best we've taken in a while. If everybody does what they're capable of doing, then it's going to be a good meet for us."

COLORADO | Cats use 36-10 run to seal victory

81.3 percent.

"There were a couple of guys who had big punches for us in the second half," Wooldridge said. "(Tyler) Hughes, Dramane (Diarra), Mario (Taybron), Akeem Wright."

One of the most noticeable adjustments in the second half was the increased defensive front, particularly against Colorado's Richard Roby, who had nine points in the first half and only five in the second, largely thanks to Wright's solid performance.

"I took it upon myself to shut him down," Wright said of Roby, the fifth-leading scorer in the Big 12, who was kept below his average 18.4 points per game. "I wanted to make him work for it. (Coach Wooldridge) decided to put me on Roby, and it went well."

Wright's defense against Roby did go well, but there were a few minutes down the stretch when things weren't going so hot for the Cats.

K-State led most of the first half, but at 2:56, Colorado grabbed the lead at 26-25 off a Marcus Hall free throw and proceeded to outscore the Cats 12-1 in the next six minutes until K-State was down 26-37.

The Cats would go on to outscore the Buffaloes 36-10 in the next 15 minutes.

With 1:51 left on the clock, K-State had a 62-49 edge, but a couple of poor inbound passes by the Wildcats, Colorado free throws and a 3-pointer allowed the Buffaloes to close the lead to 67-56 with 56 seconds remaining. But there simply wasn't enough time for an upset.

"We have a healthy respect for Colorado," Wooldridge said. "They can go on runs, and you just can't catch up. But we gained momentum and confidence, and we got a win."

The peaks Wooldridge spoke of would include Saturday's victory against Colorado.

In addition to Wright's offense and defense, senior Dramane Diarra found his 12-foot jumper again, chipping in 13 points on 6-of-10 shooting; junior Cartier Martin notched a double-double with 21 points and 10 rebounds and 100 percent free-throw shooting; (8-8) and junior guard Mario Taybron added seven points and a game-high three blocks in 23 minutes of playing time.

Wooldridge was quick to compliment his entire team's performance, but he emphasized the importance of Diarra's contribution.

"If we play well, you can probably bet $1 that Dramane played well," Wooldridge said. Diarra said he was simply following his coach's orders.

"Coach told me yesterday, if I'm open, shoot it. That's what I did, and it went in," Diarra said.

The only bit of bad news Wooldridge delivered Saturday was that sophomore guard Clint Stewart has lately been battling multiple physical ailments, and in Saturday's outing, a previous ankle injury flared up again. At the time, Wooldridge could not comment on Stewart's status for Wednesday.

VACCINES | Lafene provides CDC information

meningococcal disease.

Not all symptoms of the disease may be present, and they can appear in any order.

"I think this policy is a good thing," said Michelle Walterscheid, freshman in pre-professional secondary education and Ford Hall resident. "It's just one shot and doesn't even hurt."

Until now, Walterscheid said she was primarily influenced by her parents to get the shot.

"Before I came to college my mom made me watch a 20/20 special on meningitis," Walterscheid said. "I've had my shot."

Although the meningitis vaccination can prevent an infection, Zweimiller said there might be adverse effects associated with the shot.

"We advise students of the risks before they take the shot," Zweimiller said. "I strongly advise students read the information."

Lafene gives out information printed by the Centers for Disease Control, a federal agency based in Atlanta.

"I guess it makes sense," said Mark Dolechek, sophomore in mechanical engineering and Haymaker Hall resident. "I haven't taken the shot. I didn't know too much about it and didn't see it as a big risk."

Lafene also provides opportunities for students to get their shots outside of the clinic, Zweimiller said.

"We give the shot in the clinic, but we will also be doing special clinics in the dining centers for residence hall students and at orientation for new students," he said.

The meningitis shots are about $95, but that price is subject to change, Zweimiller said.

"If the students have to pay for the shots themselves, I'd be against them enforcing it," said Allen Chestnut, freshman in mechanical engineering and Moore Hall resident. "I'll take a shot if I have to, but nobody likes to get them."

PHARMACIES | Splitting pills can save money

group that purchases medication at a discount price," said Mark Brown-Barnett, director of Lafene Health Center's pharmacy. "We are then able to pass those savings on to students."

One way students can save on prescriptions is by choosing generic brands of medicine.

Generic drugs and name-brand drugs have the same effects on a person, said Tim Parsons, pharmacist at Barry's Drug Center, 414 Poyntz Ave.

"Generics have to meet the same guidelines as a brand as far as concentration," Parsons said. "You have to show the FDA that the generic drug acts the same on the body and that the body acts the same on the generic as it does with the name brand."

Companies try to persuade customers to buy name brands by using a variety of gimmicks, Parsons said.

"The name brand will make a sustained release product claiming it's better just to get people to switch back from the generic brand," he said. "Usually, the drug is advertised as new and improved, but really it's the same."

Students also can save on prescriptions by having good insurance.

"Insurance significantly reduces the cost of prescriptions," Riley said. "If you don't have insurance, tell your doctor, and many times he may prescribe cheaper medications that will work to heal you in the same way."

Riley said he recommends taking an insurance formulary when going to the doctor.

"Show your doctor the formulary, and it will say what the preferential drugs are," Riley said. "Generally these will be just as good of a drug, and they will be cheaper."

Another way to save on money is to split pills.

However, it is not always safe to split pills since it can change how the body responds to the drug, Riley said.

"Sometimes this can cause a drug to be instantly dumped into the body instead of a time-released affect,"

COLUMN | Summer Olympics easier to understand

"Man, that Sarah Hughes can pull off a combo double axel into a triple Lutz like nobody's business," because no one knows what that means. That makes it sound like Hughes is a burly auto mechanic, not a petite figure skater.

In the ski jump, one would think it would simply be about who can jump the furthest. But apparently, how you get there factors into the equation as well, but no normal sports fan knows the equation.

Any mention of curling or ice dancing will be left out of this discussion for the sake of everyone's sanity.

In place of watching the Winter Olympics, people are content to pick up the newspaper and read the results or go online to view the medal count and spare themselves the discomfort of trying to figure out just what an Indy nose grab is. I would explain it to you, but I prefer the pain of dental work.

The Summer Olympics are much less complicated to dissect. Sprinters must run faster than every one else, or they lose.

Pole vaulters must jump higher than their competitors. The formula for weight lifters is easy enough for even the biggest meathead to understand: Lift more than the other guy.

Never mind that the United States is much more dominant in the Summer Olympics than in the wintery, snowy version of international sports' biggest spectacle.

When the United States men's hockey team ties with such dominant powers as Latvia or loses to bastions of hockey, Slovakia and Sweden, it has a way of turning viewers away — or sending them puking into their trash cans in disgust, whichever comes first.

Until average viewers can sit down in front of their TV sets and immediately understand what it is they are watching without having to read someone's dissertation on the mechanics of moguls, the Winter Olympics will continue to be an afterthought on most sports fans' mind.

Michael Ashford is a senior in print journalism. You can e-mail him at sports@pub.ksu.edu.

NEBRASKA | Free throw sends game into OT defense, which held Nebraska (14-10, 6-7) without a field goal for nearly nine minutes. K-State held the Huskers to 20 percent shooting from the floor and held Hardy to four points on its way to a 27-17 halftime lead.

K-State built a 33-21 lead with less than 16 minutes remaining, but Nebraska stepped up the defensive pressure and went on an 18-5 run over the next seven minutes.

During the run, the Huskers forced K-State into nine turnovers and Hardy scored 11 of her game-high 23 points.

The teams traded leads until freshman Marlies Gipson went to the free-throw line with the Wildcats down 53-52, with 24 seconds left. Gipson missed the first and made the second, tying the game at 53-53 to go into overtime.

"In the second half they came out and hit a few shots that made us kind of step back a little bit, but luckily, we were able to regain our focus, but it was too late," Lehning said.

In overtime, Hardy nailed back-to-back 3-pointers to give Nebraska a 59-54 lead. Junior Claire Coggins scored five of her eight points in less than a minute to tie the game at 62-62 before Hardy's game-winning shot.

Junior Twiggy McIntyre said the loss will stick with the Wildcats.

"Losing a game like that — real close after you play that hard — it stinks," said McIntyre. "I hope we see them again really soon in the Big 12 Tournament."

RCPD looking into child porn case

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As a result of the ongoing investigation into the misuse of funds by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation department, a member of that department is being investigated on evidence that an employee used a city computer to access explicit child pornography.

Bond was set at $10,000 for Thomas E. Utermohlen, Recreation Coordinator for Adult Recreation, on charges that he used a city computer to access explicit child pornography.

While investigating the mis-handling of funds within the Manhattan Parks and Recreation department, the city of Manhattan found something officials thought was suspicious, said Capt. Gary Grubbs of the Riley County Police Department.

It was brought to the attention of the RCPD, and it began an investigation, Grubbs said.

"We're still examining the hard drives on the computer," Grubbs said.

Using EnCase forensic software given to the RCPD by the Wichita Police Department, the RCPD was able to determine child pornography files had been accessed.

EnCase forensic software was previously used in the BTK investigation.

A Manhattan man was arrested Saturday on seven felony counts resulting from an investigation into an attempted forced entry into an apartment in Manhattan.

Chad A. Lemon, 3000 Tuttle Creek Blvd., Apt. 199, was arrested at about 6:30 p.m. after the Riley County Police Department was called to respond to a report of a man armed with a knife attempting to gain entry into a apartment.

The victim and her children were in the apartment when Lemon attempted to gain access, Capt. Gary Grubbs of the RCPD said.

"An individual attempted to get into her apartment while armed with a knife," Grubbs said.

The victim held the door closed, and Lemon allegedly tried several times to push the door open, Grubbs said.

Police were in the area and arrived within one minute of the call, Grubbs said.

While police were speaking to the victim, another resident observed Lemon walking through the area and reported that he had previously used

Morning-after pill's 5-day window sparks controversy over beginnings of pregnancy

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Food and Drug Administration approved emergency contraception (EC), also known as the morning after pill, in 1999 for use with a doctor's prescription, according to a Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation's fact sheet in November 2005.

The EC used in the United States is called Plan B.

"Plan B is the only pill in the United States that is dedicated to emergency contraception," said Wendy Blank, director of Lafene Health Center's Women's Clinic.

Plan B is a way to prevent pregnancy after unprotected sex or when contraception fails. Two pills are taken for the EC.

The pills contain progestin, the same hormone found in daily oral contraceptives. The Plan B information packet given with the pills state it is 89 percent effective.

The FDA, the National Institutes of Health and the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists define the beginning of pregnancy as the implantation of a fertilized egg in the lining of the uterus.

Kasey Nelson, freshman in kinesiology and member of K-State Students for the Right to Life, said she disagreed with the medical definition of when a pregnancy begins.

"Studies in the past have shown that (the life of) a child starts at the moment of conception," Nelson said. "I don't think it's right for people to say it doesn't start until later."

The Plan B packet states that because EC prevents pregnancy before it happens, it is not an abortion.

"Sometimes, people get emergency contraception confused with other types of pills that cause abortion," said Carol Kennedy, director of health promotion/nutrition counseling at Lafene.

Medication abortion terminates a pregnancy, Kennedy said. If a woman who is already pregnant takes Plan B, the fetus will not be harmed.

"We don't want to do anything to harm a pregnancy if the person's already pregnant," said Kennedy, who also is the adviser of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators.

Blank said the main way Plan B prevents pregnancy is by inhibiting ovulation.

"Inhibition of implantation is unlikely to be the primary method of action," she said.

Side effects mentioned in the Plan B packet are nausea, abdominal pain, headache, dizziness, breast tenderness and menstrual changes.

Blank said side effects from Plan B have not been a problem with her patients.

Women used to be instructed to take the pills 12 hours apart, Kennedy said, but the procedure has changed.

"Now we get the same effect just taking it all at one time," Kennedy said. "You can now wait 120 hours. If something were to happen Friday night, they could still come in on Monday and have the benefit of the protection against pregnancy."

Blank said that the morning after pill is not an accurate name for the Plan B pills.

"That implies that's the only time to take the pills," Blank said. "There's a longer period of time to take it."

Women can get the pills during their appointment at Lafene or call to get it.

"Ideally, they're going to come in them-

Brownback to deliver Landon Lecture

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., will deliver K-State's 142nd Landon Lecture at 2 p.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

Brownback, who has served in the U.S. Senate since 1996, graduated from K-State in 1979 and will be the fourth K-State alumnus to serve as a Landon lecturer, according to a K-State media relations press release.

Brownback serves on the appropriations, judiciary and joint economic committees, as well as the Helinski Commission, of which he is chairman, according to www.brownback.senate.gov.

Brownback was invited to speak in August, said Charles Reagan, associate to the president and Landon Lecture committee chair.

"We've had quite a few senators speak over the years,"

Reagan said. "I think it's a real important event for students to go to, to see one of the leading senators speak at their university."

Reagan and Thomas Jackson, McCain marketing and development officer, said they do not know the topic of Brownback's speech.

"I would imagine he will probably be speaking some about the war in Iraq and maybe the upcoming legislative elections," Jackson said.

Jackson also said he hopes students take advantage of hearing Brownback speak.

"I think that the Landon Lecture series as a whole is designed to bring about political awareness and awareness of current events that are affecting our country. And by having Sen. Brownback come, it's bringing that a little closer to home."

Jackson said that for those who cannot see the lecture at

Possible ethics problems
TOPEKA — Invitations to a fund-raising event for Attorney General Phill Kline apparently went to some lobbyists, despite a state law prohibiting such solicitations while the Kansas Legislature is in session, Kline's office has disclosed. Spokesman Whitney Watson said Monday that the incident resulted from an "honest mistake" by a consulting firm handling the mailing of invitations.

Headlines from the nation's universities

Boston U. dining halls combat viruses

Illustration by Elvis Achelpohl | COLLEGIAN

BOSTON — Across the Boston University campus, students are experiencing various symptoms of a new virus spreading through the residence halls, prompting several changes in dining halls across campus.

"We have had a number of people in [to Student Health Services]," BU spokesman Colin Riley said. "It's trickling now. It's down to the number of people who normally come in with upset stomachs, diarrhea and vomiting."

For Clafin Hall resident Eric Silver, the illness required more than a trip to Student Health Services.

"From Wednesday night until Thursday morning, I was puking my guts out all night," the College of Arts and Sciences sophomore said.

Silver said since he got sick last week, he has noticed several changes in the West Campus dining hall.

"There is no self-service now," he said. "Everything ... they have to have someone serve it to you."

In a letter e-mailed to BU students, Dean of Students Kenneth Elmore addressed the issue and said the virus, believed to be a Norovirus, can travel from student to student through ingestion.

"Dining Services has increased employee training (reinforcing procedures already in place)," he said in the e-mail. "Additionally, in order to reduce the likelihood of foods becoming contaminated by students, Dining Services has eliminated unsupervised self-service food stations, where possible, and will be installing alcohol-based hand sanitizers at the entrances of all residence hall dining rooms."

Elmore said the e-mail was precautionary.

Although the virus generally is classified as a Norovirus, which includes many virus types, Elmore said the Massachusetts Department of Health believes it to be a Norwalk-type virus.

U. of Arkansas professor's research casts doubt on effects of abstinence education

FAYETTEVILLE, Ark. — Since President Bush's 2004 State of the Union address, when he announced plans to triple the federal funding for "abstinence-only" education programs to a reported $270 million by the 2005 fiscal year, several abstinence education programs have been commissioned and put into effect by the Department of Health and Human Services.

Later that year, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., formed a group in Congress to conduct an analysis of abstinence education based on content rather than effectiveness. The group's report, published in 2004, found that more than 80 percent of abstinence-only curricula contained "false, misleading or distorted information about reproductive health."

Of the 13 most commonly used programs examined, 11 were found to have problems with medical accuracy.

During Laura Bush's trip to West Africa in January, she defended the focus on sexual abstinence in the U.S. government's handling of the global AIDS pandemic.

"AIDS is disproportionately affecting women and girls," Janine Parry, associate professor of political science, said. "The statistics are particularly disturbing in Africa. I don't think the first lady is suggesting this, but that is not a product of promiscuity. Research tells us many times it's a product of sexual violence."

Parry pointed out that abstinence requires both potential partners to agree to abstain from sexual intercourse.

"The granting of sex is often not under the control of the women and girls she's addressing," Parry said. "That's not just a third-world thing. Coercive sex is also a problem in the Western world."

Candidates review student election rules

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Candidates for Student Governing Association elections met Monday to review campaign rules.

The meeting was one of two meetings candidates could attend.

Candidates are required to attend one, but there is another meeting at 4 today in Union 212.

Bill Harlan, assistant coordinator for the Office of Student Activities and Services, said the meetings are beneficial to new candidates since they learn what they can and cannot do in their campaigning.

"It is also beneficial for those involved before because it's a chance for them to be made aware of anything that's changed in the past year," Harlan said.

Election regulations can be found at www.ksu.edu/elections.

According to the Elections Regulations Code, all campaign materials and activities shall conform to state laws, Manhattan ordinances, Kansas State Association of Residence Halls policy and all university rules.

All K-State copyrighted or trademarked logos are not allowed in campaign materials and activities.

Active campaigning is defined by the code as the direct distribution of campaign materials or verbal encouragement to promote or oppose a campaign. Unsolicited distribution of campaign materials within buildings on campus other than the Union is prohibited.

Chalking is permitted only on sidewalks, and no chalking is allowed within 30 feet of the entrance to any building on campus, according to the Elections Regulations Code.

Elections Commissioner Tanner Banion said chalking will not be allowed on the ramp leading up to Hale Library or on the angled potting plants by Durland Hall. Campaign activities that disturb or interfere with classes also are not permitted, Banion said.

"This includes using a bullhorn in the quad for campaigning," he said.

In terms of campaigning on Facebook.com, Banion said candidates are not allowed to purchase banner ads or ask random people to join their campaign groups.

Candidates also should turn off the "groupies" function for their campaign groups to prevent unfair associations and keep posts in the groups respectful, Banion said.

Campaign tables are only allowed in the K-State Student Union during weekdays.

Primary election candidates can set up tables from Thursday until Wednesday, March 1 for the primary elections, which are Feb. 28 and March 1.

All candidates can set up tables from March 2 until March 8 for general elections, which are March 7 and 8.

Students can report violation of campaign regulations by completing a Violations Complaint form within 24 hours after discovery of the suspected violation.

The forms are on the elec-

Voting for Student Governing Association primary elections begins at 8 a.m. Feb. 28 and ends at 6 p.m. March 1. Students can vote at spelections.k-state.edu.

tions Web site and at OSAS and are to be turned in to OSAS.

After receiving a complaint, Banion shall determine whether the violation is a major or minor offense, which is defined in the Elections Regulations Code.

For minor offenses, Banion might impose penalties deemed appropriate, according to the Elections Regulations Code.

Major offenses could cause the disqualification of a candidate from the primary or general election or impose other penalties as deemed by the Elections Review Committee.

Expense reports for candidates also were discussed at Monday's meeting.

Candidates are required to keep track of how much they spend, where they spend it and who gives them campaign money.

They should keep and attach all receipts to the expense report, Banion said.

"Even if you spend zero dollars on your campaign, you still have to turn it in," he said.

Expense reports are due by 4 p.m. Friday for primary election candidates and by 4 p.m. March 3 for general election candidates. There will be no exceptions for late reports, Banion said.

"It's not fair to allow others to go over deadlines when some have made it," Banion said.

Rape awareness organization starts campus chalk campaign

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All around campus there are announcements on the sidewalk that say, "W.A.R. is coming" or "It's time for W.A.R."

W.A.R., Wildcats Against Rape, is a new group that is part of PEERS, a three-hour class which brings in various professionals to teach about different aspects of rape.

Students can learn to educate others through this course, said Mary Todd, assistant director of the Women's Center.

"A number of students, male and female, were asking about a group made up of both those who had taken the class and those who have not, to bring activism to the issue of violence against K-State women and against women in general," Todd said.

The new program is led by Mary Stolz, president of W.A.R. and senior in mass communications. There are many goals the group will try to accomplish as it gains force around K-State.

Students who have joined W.A.R. said they felt something needed to be done about the safety of women on campus.

"We all want to live in a society where we are able to trust, be trusted and live outside the confinements of fear," Stolz said. "W.A.R. members are taking the initiative to challenge the current environment where one out of four college women will suffer a rape or attempted rape between the ages of 13 and college graduation."

Members of W.A.R. began a sidewalk chalk campaign to raise awareness for the group. The logo of the W.A.R. program is a solitary figure standing up to a military tank.

"Because of our dedication to nonviolent ideals, W.A.R. has chosen the representation of Tiananmen Square to illustrate our mission," Stolz said.

Some students said they take defensive precautions against attackers.

"I carry pepper spray on me at all times," said Heba Abdul, senior in hotel and restaurant management. "Even with that I don't feel 100-percent safe, especially on campus at night."

The non-violent actions of W.A.R. will hopefully gain attention and results around campus, Stolz said.

"Our goal is to change the part of our culture that makes it acceptable for people to behave this way," Stolz said. "W.A.R. may be a small group but the ideal of nonviolence is what gives us hope and power."

TO THE POINT Morning-after pill should be readily available

The controversy surrounding emergency contraceptives, such as the morning-after pill, has both sides of the spectrum debating whether such forms of birth control should be made readily available.

There are many reasons why Plan B should be easily accessible. Accidents happen, be it a condom break or poor planning/judgment, and the morning-after pill could help cut back on the amount of unintended pregnancies.

Those opposed to Plan B claim it is a pseudo-form of abortion, and it stems from the debate around the definition of when conception happens.

However, the morning-after pill is a noninvasive way to prevent pregnancies, and should not be confused with the abortion pill. Plan B prevents pregnancy by inhibiting ovulation from occurring.

If the woman is already pregnant, the pill will not harm the fetus. Plan B essentially is the same as regular birth control pills but with a higher dosage of progestin.

Making Plan B available over-the-counter could decrease the number of abortions caused by accidental pregnancies. Getting a prescription for the medication can be inconvenient and embarrassing for some people and this would make the product more accessible.

Although the morning-after pill should be accessible, it should not be used as a primary form of birth control.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

America's homeland security has been foiled by a show dog. Oh, help.

Although no link has been established with Vivi the prize Whippet and terrorism, the connection should not be hastily written off. Untrustworthy dogs, those Whippets.

One only marvels at what we have gained as we barter away our liberty and dignity — billion-dollar agencies without enough guile to catch a dog, a feat the local dog catcher performs with frequency.

The modern airport seems less a travel hub and more a warden system. Travelers are treated as if they are dangerous. Is it sane for a nation to be in perpetual fear of its inhabitants?

My mother recently commented that she had to hand-carry valuables because airport security paws through your checked luggage and, occasionally, helps themselves. My grandmother, a remnant of an older America where people were free, said in astonishment, "They can't go through your bag!"

Reality is ugly.

Those who work airport security are a pristine example of the caliber of federal employee: rude goons, unemployable by anyone else.

The requirements for Transportation Security Administration employment are a General Educational Development or, failing that, a year's experience working security. Sound like a beacon for the apt and intelligent to anyone?

So those of us who wish only to move from point A to point B endure a harassment procedure that would make the Soviets proud, wrought on us by people underqualified to work gas pumps.

"Step up, put your bag on the table, don't touch it."

I love bag searches, which are invasive and wholly unnecessary. Mechanical detectors, or for that matter, such technological innovations as the dog, would be able to detect explosives in seconds. But, if airport security failed to ritualize rooting around in your underwear with the grace of a warthog, we'd never be reminded they have the power to do so.

"Where are you going? Why?"

God help you if you're traveling to Washington, D.C. The very thought of a citizen visiting their capital is abhorrent to airport security.

"Empty your pockets, take off your shoes."

I once was told to take my shoes and socks off before having the bottom of my feet searched. National security and all; got to keep an eye out for calluses.

Do something deemed suspicious by the brownshirts and you're carted off to some airport dungeon. Maybe they have bags of peanuts.

We're treated like criminals by those who provide security incapable of stopping a dog, and gained ... what exactly? Certainly not any amount of safety.

It is unfortunate that a nation that once prided itself as the "land of the free" now regards its citizens as a threat. But, liberty here, as in the rest of the world, steadily evaporates.

Most will never notice because most have no concept of liberty. Given Monday Night Football and Coors Light, the majority of Americans are content. Being thought dangerous at the airport lends excitement to a life that has never known danger.

For those with enough sense to be insulted, there is little recourse. Quit flying I suppose, but eventually we'll be subject to interstate security, then household security.

Most will say I'm being paranoid. Hopefully I am. My grandmother never dreamed the federal government would be rifling through her luggage.

I don't foresee improvement. The government will likely not have a change of heart and return to us the freedoms it has spent many decades taking away. Airport security will not suddenly become friendly, efficient or, for that matter, literate.

We can only hope our weakness does not become exploited by our enemies, lest airplanes piloted by fundamentalist poodles wreak havoc on an unsuspecting nation.

Lost socks serve as analogy for college life

In my experience, dryers serve different purposes.

First, dryers obviously dry clothes. This is especially handy, amazingly enough, after washing clothes.

However, the second purpose is to be a black hole for single socks. It seems that quite often two socks go into the dryer, and only one comes out.

If you're still reading, either you love laundry stories or you are wondering where I am going with this.

One night, I was folding my freshly cleaned whites in the laundry room located in the bowels of my fraternity house, and I noticed something strange.

Every sock I had washed made it through the drying cycle. I was pleased there was balance and no random single socks lingering about the bottom of the dryer.

This, I discovered, was analogous to my life.

When things are in balance, life seems to flow smoothly. When you find "single socks," problems tend to follow. Sometimes these are big problems; sometimes they are trivial problems.

Either way, they are problems.

College life tends to be a test of balance. Class, homework, job, bills, family, significant other and many other unlistable items all pull college students in different directions.

Now that my four-year sentence is rapidly coming to a close, I am looking back at the choices I have made throughout my college career. I find that more often than not, my life has been out of balance.

Sometimes I spent way too many hours at work, pining away for the few dollars tossed my way every two weeks.

Money aside, I wouldn't trade my experience for anything. It will help me in the future when looking for a job and entering the working world.

However, these long nights of journalistic endeavors meant sacrificing fraternity party nights, trips to the 'Ville and often a lot of classwork. This caused a balance issue, and it showed, because my grades slipped faster than a clown on a banana peel, and my involvement in other organizations began to wane as well.

The worst problem was that I did not even recognize there was a problem. It was as if a reality-blocking lens blinded me from seeing the truth.

Finally, I recognized I had a problem; the sad part was that I recognized it two days after finals week ended.

Now, don't worry about me. I have solved my recent issues with balancing my life. I am going to graduate in May with my $20,000 piece of paper and the ability to get a job.

My concern is for others in similar situations whose lives are tilted and skewed out of balance. It often is extremely difficult to see and even more difficult to correct. I encourage every person on campus to take a step back and evaluate how you balance your lives.

There are many people and organizations on campus that can assist in the restoration of balance, but in the end, the responsibility is yours. If you have to admit a mistake, admit it. If you have to drop a class or leave an organization, do it.

I hate to say it, but the battle only gets worse as time goes by. My closest friends will quickly admit I still am not perfect in balancing my responsibilities, but I am much better than I was.

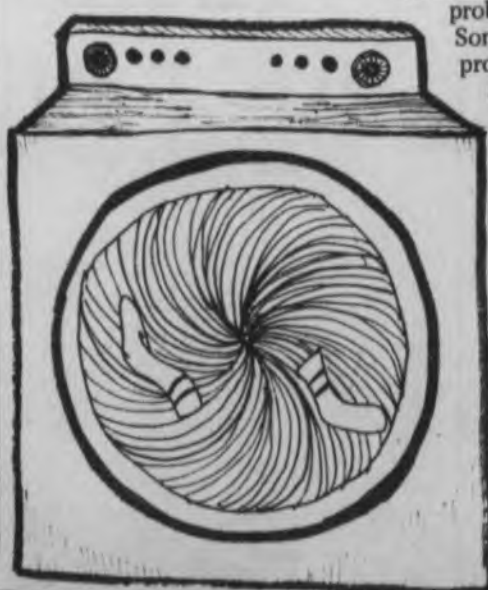

My advice — take it or leave it — is to maintain balance with your responsibilities. Have fun, learn and experience new things, but don't fill the dinner plate with too many items.

Finish your collegiate laundry load with as many socks as you started with.

Burger King sanitation not up to par

Editor,

I have been lied to. As an avid supporter of Burger King, I have always been told I can "have it my way" at the fast food chain. Apparently, this slogan does not apply to sanitation requests.

Two weeks ago I stopped at our local Burger King in Aggieville to indulge in chicken tenders before the night's end. I should have gone to Taco Bell. As I stood in line I made one small request to the manager: Dispose of the numerous chicken tenders I saw fall to the floor. Instead, a worker scooped the polluted poultry back in their box as if nothing had happened.

I am not a health freak, and I have occasionally abided by the "five-second rule," but the guidelines change for the Burger King kitchen floor. Despite numerous suggestions to dump the E. coli sticks, the manager denied this had happened and threatened to throw me out of her distinguished restaurant. It seems the nation's most profitable Burger King can't afford to lose 50 cents on Grade-E chicken.

I didn't relent, knowing I would end up with the tainted tenders if I placed my order, so I was tossed by Burger King security guards. Last week, I returned to the scene of the crime and I again was asked to leave by the same night manager.

Since my suggestions are deemed as unreasonable, maybe the health department should check the cleanliness of the King's castle. Maybe they, unlike me, can "have it their way."

Expansion on agenda tonight

By Owen Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission will consider an ordinance to expand Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community when it meets at 7 tonight at City Hall, 1101 Poyntz Ave.

Mayor Pro-Tem Bruce Snead said the proposed expansion is necessary because of Manhattan's growing senior citizen population and that Meadowlark Hills might need to accommodate those citizens.

"Manhattan, like every other community in Kansas, will have an increase in its aging population," Snead said. "Meadowlark Hills is an excellent senior living complex, nationally recognized for its work."

Snead said the expansion would involve annexing a .2-acre tract of land and rezoning three tracts of land, totaling a little more than five acres, and building two new duplexes near the north end of Meadowlark Hills.

City Commissioner Tom Phillips said the proposed ordinance will allow for the development and an amendment to the final development plan would involve adding the new land.

Phillips said the proposed ordinance would not increase taxes.

"(The proposed ordinance would) add new housing to the inventory to allow for expansion of the Meadowlark Hills facility," Phillips said. "The ordinance is simply a mechanism to allow this to occur, and the amendment would add land to the original site plan."

Snead said the proposed ordinance would benefit greatly Meadowlark Hills and the community.

"Adding some land, rezoning some land and looking toward the future," Snead said of the ordinance.

Mustaches crucial for success

For the last 50 years or so, champions at all levels have used one of the most guarded secrets in professional sports to destroy their opponents.

It's something more useful than any performance-enhancing drug, even though it cannot be swallowed, injected or rubbed into the skin.

This weapon is grown, and it has come to be known as the "Power Mustache."

You might call me a Monday morning quarterback, but look at the stats. Have you noticed that this year's leading candidate for NCAA Men's Basketball Player of the Year, Adam Morrison from Gonzaga, has a mustache?

For years, professional sports have tried to cover up the reason behind these athletes' success, when in actuality, the answer was literally right under our noses. As this long-kept secret infiltrates the ranks of collegiate athletics, especially at the Division-I level, we see an even greater effect.

Here are the facts — when was the last time the Gonzaga Bulldogs threatened to walk into the NCAA Tournament boasting a No. 1 seed? Not since Morrison caught wind of the secret, sprouted a 1970s-style mustache and seemingly overnight led the nation in scoring.

The mustache isn't simply a college thing, either.

Take a look at the NBA's all-time greatest big men — Wilt Chamberlain, Bill Russell, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and Shaq all had a little something on their face that screamed dominance. The intrinsic beauty here is that the mustache isn't merely for physical intimidation; it also puts tremendous mental pressure on any opponent. When was the last time Los Angeles Lakers coach Phil Jackson was clean-shaven? Sure enough, nine NBA Championship rings later, his salt-and-pepper face handle still stands strong.

The mustache also stretches beyond basketball.

Is it a coincidence that the only two quarterbacks with beards in the American Football Conference faced off in their conferences' championship games? Is it sheer coincidence that the two coaches in the Super Bowl both had mustaches?

Pittsburgh Steeler quarterback Ben Roethlisberger's beard — and facial hair around the league in general — have come to represent determination. It instills fear in opponents and provides a tough, aggressive spirit to the subscriber and his teammates or players.

The act of wearing a beard or mustache to front-page your masculinity automatically comes with a chip for your shoulder, and this year, certain teams in the NFL and beyond were reaping the benefits.

Two words for you: "Mike Ditka."

And don't forget about his modern-day stunt double, Fresno State Coach Pat Hill, who carries the motto, "Anytime. Anywhere." With something literally growing directly between you and your enemy, you immediately are granted the upper hand and are on your way to triumphant victory.

Former Steeler running back Jerome Bettis has always carried a mustache, and the greatest winner of the 21st century, Tom Brady, brandished a beard through most of what became three Super Bowl title runs.

In the mid-90s, Green Bay Packer quarterback Brett Favre also was "warm-faced," considering he beat New England's clean-shaven Drew Bledsoe.

Now, some will make the case that these statements are flawed because the losing Seahawks' coach Mike Holmgren did, in fact, have a mustache (which no doubt carried him to the Super Bowl).

But take note of his adversary — Steeler's coach Bill Cowher brandished a 'stache as well, and it was just flat-out thicker and stronger. No questions asked.

Think about this: who would you rather have on your sideline

Cats pick up win in Utah, lose to BYU

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team was able to learn on the move as it traveled to Utah last weekend.

K-State began its two-city tour of the state winning 5-2 over Utah on Friday. Despite the victory, Coach Steve Bietau said he thought his team did not play as well as it could have, often struggling to win individual matches.

The Wildcats began the day by losing the doubles point before fighting back to win five of six singles matches. However, the victories were anything but pretty, Bietau said.

K-State's chances of winning the match were even in jeopardy at one point, senior Jessica Simosa said.

"We won against Utah when, for a while, it looked like we were going to lose," she said. "There was point a when everyone was literally losing their match. There were three matches in play, and we needed to win two and all three courts we were losing. It was scary to think we could lose, but at the end we were able to pull it off."

Sophomore Olga Klimova said she did not feel as if the team had won the match. "It was really tough because after the match it really didn't feel like we won 5-2. It felt more like we lost 3-4," Klimova said.

Freshman Maria Perevoschikova won her fifth match in a row, defeating Cinthia Saucedo in straight sets (6-4, 6-3).

"I've just been trying to play as well as I can and continue to build on the things that have given me success," Perevoschikova said.

The Wildcats, taking what they learned from Utah, traveled to Provo, Utah, to face Brigham Young, the No. 20-ranked team in the country. BYU defeated K-State 6-1, but Bietau said he was happy to see his players had learned from some of the mistakes they had made.

"You go out and play and see what you're doing right and see what you're doing wrong," Bietau said. "Our No. 1 doubles team, for example, just weren't playing aggressive enough against Utah. I think a combination

Wildcats face Big 12 Conference's No. 1 team in OU

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women will face the top team in the Big 12 Conference tonight when Oklahoma comes to Bramlage Coliseum at 7 tonight.

The Sooners are 23-0 overall and remain undefeated in conference play at 13-0 behind strong play from freshman Courtney Paris.

Paris leads the conference with 199 rebounds and is second in scoring, averaging 20 points per game.

"It's definitely going to be a big challenge," freshman forward Marlies Gipson said. "I've played against her before when I was 14, and she was amazing then. She's going to get her points, but I think we're just going to have to come down as a team and play team defense and do what we can to limit her."

K-State (17-7, 7-6 Big 12) begins its final two home games of the season tonight. The Wildcats also are on a two-game losing streak after falling to Iowa State on Feb. 11 and then to Nebraska in an overtime thriller Saturday. The Wildcats are ranked fifth in the Big 12 with only three games remaining on their regular season schedule.

"We hit the skid with the losses to Iowa State and Nebraska, but you bounce back with a victory against either Oklahoma or Baylor and you're right back in the mix of it," Coach Deb Patterson said. "You're stirring up the dust, and that's exactly what I prefer to be doing as we head down the stretch of March."

"It sounds great, but the reality is, those teams are great, and they're great for a reason. We've really got to work to continue to elevate our level of play."

Patterson said she saw the game with Oklahoma and the next game with Baylor on the schedule, but put them out of her mind early on.

"I tried to ignore the bottom part of our schedule early on, and now it's here, and it's the reality of this league," she said. "It is tough. It's very challenging. We're playing great basketball teams down the stretch, but that's what you compete for."

"My priority with our basketball team is that we compete hard, we compete well, we keep getting better and that we don't give anything to anyone, that we fight for whatever it is that the game brings."

Junior guard Claire Coggins said she eagerly anticipates the game but knows Paris will be a tough competitor.

"I love these kinds of games because we're the underdogs, and I just think we play that well whenever we have that type of a competition," Coggins said. "Courtney is a great player. She is absolutely one of the best players we've ever seen. She's going to be someone we totally have to focus on. She's a huge player for Oklahoma. She's the motor so as long as we can shut that down, we'll be all right."

K-State's Marlies Gipson fights for a loose ball during the second half Saturday against Nebraska.

Claire Coggins misses on a block attempt on Nebraska's Kiera Hardy on Saturday. K-State will play Oklahoma tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

SPT | Sportscaster great Gowdy dies at 86

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Curt Gowdy, one of the signature voices of sports for a generation and the longtime broadcaster for the Boston Red Sox, died Monday at 86.

He died in Palm Beach, Calif., after a long battle with leukemia, Red Sox spokeswoman Pam Ganley said.

Gowdy made his broadcasting debut in 1944 and went on to call 13 World Series and 16 All-Star games.

In 1951 Gowdy became main play-by-play voice on the Red Sox broadcast team. He left the Red Sox in 1966 for a 10-year stint as "Game of the Week" announcer for NBC. He also was the longtime host of the "American Sportsman" series.

MLB | Bonds backs off retirement talk

SAN FRANCISCO — Barry Bonds said he's retiring after this season. Then he said he wasn't sure.

The San Francisco Giants slugger gave differing accounts this weekend, first saying this year would be his last — no matter whether he breaks Hank Aaron's home run record. On Sunday night, Bonds said he would play in 2007 if his surgically repaired knee is OK.

In a story posted on USA Today's Web site Sunday afternoon, Bonds said the game isn't fun anymore, and he is sick of answering questions about steroids.

A few hours later, MLB.com reported Bonds, who needs 48 homers to surpass Aaron's total of 755, said his health will determine how long he plays.

NFL | Williams involved in drug test controversy

MIAMI — Sources have told ESPN's Hank Goldberg that Miami Dolphins running back Ricky Williams' violation of the NFL's substance-abuse policy is not a matter of a missed test.

Williams has failed a drug test, the sources said, but the substance for which he tested positive is not known.

Denver TV station KDVR first reported Sunday night that Williams violated the NFL's substance abuse policy for a fourth time and faces a one-year suspension from the league.

The Miami Herald, citing two sources of its own, confirmed the station's report that Williams has violated the policy, although neither source would say whether Williams failed a drug test or if he missed a required test, which is also a violation.

Williams has tested positive for marijuana three times and served a four-game suspension when he returned to the NFL last season following a one-year retirement.

Shopping spree

Aggieville boutiques offer fashionable clothing finds

Photos by Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Why drive all the way to Kansas City or Topeka (and waste such precious gas money) for a shopping spree, when Manhattan's own little shopping paradise lies right under our noses?

I am referring to the boutiques in Aggieville, which I feel are quite exceptional and are too often overlooked.

From Gei Gei's, Zotcis Attire, and the newest shopping destination, Tami's Trendy with a Twist, each store offers clothing and accessories that are much more fashionable than you could hope to find at the mall.

Here's a breakdown of a few local shopping boutiques that Aggieville has to offer.

GEI GEI'S

Located at the corner of 12th and Moro Street, Gei Gei's is an adorable little boutique many students overlook because it caters to mature customers.

COURTNEY LAIR

This is true; however, it is not entirely the case. I came across plenty of things that many college girls would snap up in a heartbeat.

First and foremost, they carry a selection of darling dresses from designers including Nicole Miller that would be ideal for spring formals, weddings and graduation. Prices start around $100.

What really caught my eye was a beautiful pair of graphic black and white cowboy boots.

Also, Charm and Luck, a line of colorful leather handbags and belts, embellished with studs and rhinestones, would add a touch of glam to everyday casual.

ZOTCIS ATTIRE

The new merchandise this season at Zotcis is dominated by spring break-worthy separates.

They have lots of cute tank tops embellished with sequins and sparkles – perfect to accompany you on your nightly festivities. At prices between $15 and $30, why not get two or three?

Zotcis also carries great accessories including jewelry and shoes – all at very college-friendly price points.

TAMI'S TRENDY WITH A TWIST

Located next to Planet Sub, Trendy with a Twist is the newest address on the Aggieville shopping scene.

Tami Magocs, a K-State graduate, and her husband John wanted to bring the latest names as well as fashion cult favorites to Manhattan.

"We're always looking for the next new line, and we just love the energy of Aggieville," Magocs said.

Here are some of the fabulous brands that every fashion fiend should check out at Trendy:

- 2 B Free – super-comfy tracksuits coveted by celebs
- Joystick – these bright embroidered tops are love at first sight
- Lacoste – the preppy classic
- Three Dot – a collection of ultra-flattering T-shirt
- Grail – known for its tissue-weight shirts with splatter paint and edgy graphics

Good luck trying to find a department store or boutique in Kansas with as diverse a selection of premium denim than Trendy's. The shelves are stocked with the latest names in denim including Taverniti, People's Liberation, J & Company, Paper Denim and Cloth, 1921, and of course the quintessential Seven for all Mankind.

Guys, need not fret, because there is something in store for you, too, of course.

Trendy boasts an extensive selection of Ben Sherman, including track jackets, polos and dress shirts.

Ed Hardy hats, emblazoned with tattoo images, lend a bit of a rock 'n' roll to any look.

However, check back often, because new merchandise rotates on at least a quarterly basis, giving your wardrobe more selections.

We already know the restaurants and nightlife in the 'Ville are fabulous.

Next time you are out and about, be sure to pop in to one (or all) of the local boutiques, because no outing is truly complete without a little retail therapy.

Burned compact discs not as reliable as originals

By Ashleigh Williams
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Burning compact discs and DVDs are becoming a popular technology in today's fast-paced world. More people have strayed from buying CDs and DVDs thanks to downloadable forms of entertainment.

What some people might not know is that this technology could have a limited lifespan.

According to www.pc-world.com, discs commonly used for burning CDs only have a lifespan of two to five years. The CDs have a layer of dye over the recording surface. This dye can be altered by heat, therefore making them unreadable to the laser.

There are very limited options when it comes to trying to improve the lifespan of burned CDs, according to the Web site. One way to increase the life is to always keep CDs in dark, cool places. Although this will not increase the total lifespan by much, it will help.

Most companies do not use the lifespan as a high selling point; therefore, it is hard to determine if buying higher quality CDs actually has an effect on the life of a CD.

To make sure none of the media gets lost, it is a good idea to transfer old storage to new storage every few years, said Tom Mahoney, computer store sales representative for the K-State Student Union Computer Store.

"Every three to five years you should duplicate everything on the newest technology available," Mahoney said.

There are some who have had CDs for more than the expected lifespan. Many students find that taking good care of CDs and storing them in proper places helps to maximize how long they will last, said Casey Harshman, junior in pre-journalism and mass communications.

"I have had CDs for close to eight years," Harshman said. "I try to keep them in the case, but I figure that by the time that they stop working, I don't listen to that music much anymore anyway. Either that or I will probably just download more anyway."

CDs are not the only option for storage. There are other long-term storage options that are said to last longer. According to www.computerhope.com, the best storage options are magnetic tape, which is said to last anywhere from 30 to 100 years. Along with this type of storage, there is the possibility of deterioration, as with any medium.

Other options are flash memory drives and portable hard drives.

No matter what storage is used, most seem to think the best idea is to continually update and save the media from time to time.

"I always update the important things that I want to keep around, like my pictures and stuff," Harshman said. "Every time I buy new technology, it seems like there is something better that comes out the next month, so it is always better to be safe than sorry."

Eisenhower's grandson to speak in lecture series

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Lou Douglas Lecture Series will provide a lecture on public issues by David Eisenhower, director of the Institute for Public Service at the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania and grandson of former President Dwight D. Eisenhower.

The lecture, "A Call to Serve," will be at 7 p.m. March 9 in Forum Hall at the K-State Student Union. The event, sponsored by UFM Community Learning Center, is free and open to the public.

Marcia Hornung, educational coordinator for UFM, said Eisenhower is a well-known person who has worked in public service and will communicate its importance to others.

"He's very much involved with public service," Hornung said. "I think those are really important issues. He's someone in the field that's very knowledgeable but also has a tie to Kansas."

Hornung said involvement in public service is something people know they should do but are not always sure how to get started.

"I think a lot of college students don't know the process of how to change something in the community and what's the local government structure," Hornung said. "As a perception, young people want to be involved, but they just need an avenue of getting involved."

To precede Eisenhower's presentation, a panel discussion "Raise Your Voice: Act Locally" will be at 7 p.m. Thursday at the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, 501 Poyntz Ave. Local elected officials and community advocates will attend to help discuss ways citizens can share concerns about public issues.

Current and former state legislators will inform citizens about expressing concern at the state level in a session called "Communicating as Constituents." The session will be at 7 p.m. March 2 at the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

The National Issues Forum, "News Media and Society: How to Restore Public Trust," is an opportunity for people to talk about pertinent issues and go through the process of making group solutions, Hornung said. The forum will be from 3:30 to 5 p.m. March 9.

All events are free and open to the public.

As a member of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series Committee, Mary Tolar, associate director of leadership studies and programs for civic leadership, said combining a speaker and community discussions will provide avenues of public involvement.

"In an effort to capture interest and build momentum, we're having a workshop focused on working locally," Tolar said. "If citizens fail to be engaged, then our whole system of government is at risk."

While working with students at K-State, Tolar said she knows many who want to help in their community but might not follow through with their ideas.

"Any involvement at a young age is an important exercise of your citizenship," Tolar said. "The instinct to serve and lead isn't enough."

For more information about the Lou Douglas Lecture Series, e-mail the UFM Community Learning Center at ufm@ksu.edu or go to the lecture Web site at www.k-state.edu/ufm/LouDouglas.

Students prepare for spring break

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's the time of year when students begin dreaming of far-off destinations, relaxation and getting in shape.

"To get in shape for spring break, I lift and do cardio," Lyndsey O'Malley, freshman in dietetics, said. "I'm trying to lose a few pounds from first semester and get fit."

As spring break approaches, many students choose to prepare by going to the Peters Recreation Complex for help with their workout routine.

"The Rec begins getting busier right after Christmas until spring break," said Brad Zimmerman, junior in pre-professional business administration. "The busiest time is in the evening, from about 4 to 9."

Amber Long, assistant director of Peters Recreation Services and coordinator of fitness and wellness, said she agreed.

"Our 'Extreme Abs and Back' class is especially full right before break," Long said. "While this class is great and popular, students need to realize you can't get a six-pack just by going. It also requires cardio training paired with good eating habits."

The Rec Complex offers many services to students at a lower cost than anywhere else in Manhattan, Long said. With students already paying a privilege fee for use of regular Rec Complex services, the center has the ability to keep fees low.

John Coval, senior in horticulture, runs on the track Monday afternoon at Memorial Stadium. Memorial Stadium offers a variety of areas to exercise.

Students looking to get in shape before spring break can use the services of the Wellness Center, Wildcat Personal Training, Nutrition Services and Educational Services.

The Wellness Center is on the main floor of the Rec Complex, and students are able to stop by to ask questions, gather information and check out magazines. Also, fitness consultants are available 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Monday through Friday, to answer questions about personal training and fitness.

When looking for an exercise program specifically designed for an individual, a Wildcat Personal Trainer is another option. The trainers follow industry standards and guidelines put forth by national fitness organizations.

Training services can be purchased in the Rec Services administrative office, 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

"The more sessions you buy, the less it is going to cost you," Long said.

"The best time to use the Rec Center is when it isn't busy, because more machines are free to use," Long said. "This is generally in the mornings or early afternoons."

The Rec Complex offers a free clinic before spring break at 7 p.m. March 6 in the main lobby. Free fitness testing for strength, flexibility and body composition will be provided.

Planning continues for Salina Student Life Center

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In an attempt to have an on-campus recreation center, K-State-Salina is in the process of developing plans for Student Life Center.

Brendan Haiduk, senior in aeronautical technology-professional pilot and Student Governing Association president at K-State-Salina, also said the Student Life Center would be a student union facility, similar to the K-State Student Union.

"Right now, we don't really have a central hub for students," Haiduk said.

He said SGA has taken action by establishing a student privilege fee. Last fall, SGA passed a referendum for students to pay an annual fee for the next 20 years.

These contributions should provide about $3.5 million for construction of the facility, Haiduk said.

Right now the process is on hold, said Kristin Magette, coordinator of K-State Salina public and alumni relations.

"The project itself is still awaiting approval through the state building process," she said.

Magette said once funding is secured for the facility, the university can hire a design team.

"The design team will be responsible for a wide range of things," she said. "One of those things includes having focus groups with students, alumni, staff - whoever needs a focus group to help make decisions about the design."

She said the process is laid out in such a way that significant planning cannot begin until the design team has been approved, so there have only been informal meetings to share information.

Magette said she hopes efforts continue to build the Student Life Center.

"Our hope is that groundbreaking will start this summer," she said.

Dixie Schierlman, associate dean of K-State-Salina, said the Student Life Center will provide more student opportunities on campus.

"It will provide more of a collegiate atmosphere for us to recruit students," she said. "It will also improve student retention."

Schierlman said community members also will have the opportunity to utilize the space, which will include several various services.

The Student Life Center will house a cafeteria, bookstore, small theater, meeting and conference rooms, and office space along with the recreation and wellness center.

Schierlman said K-State-Salina has researched building this facility for a number of years, finally reaching the critical mass of students.

"We have the space on campus for it, and we're ready to move forward to the next level for recruitment," she said. "The timing is right."

New steak restaurant to open in March

By Megan Green
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another new restaurant has arrived in Manhattan.

Doe's Eat Place, 2605 Stagg Hill Road, is a family steakhouse that offers a basic menu.

"It's a very casual family restaurant and a very laid-back atmosphere," co-owner Lara Mallean said.

Doe's has finished hiring employees and is planning to open sometime toward the end of March.

Doe's will feature a full-service bar, private dining room, televisions for game-days and a seating capacity of 150 to 170 people.

Doe's Eat Place started in Greenville, Miss., in 1941 and recently began offering franchise options. This is when Lara and husband Tony Mallean decided to open their own restaurant in Manhattan.

"I went to Kansas State, and I graduated in 1989,"

Tony said. "I've always loved Manhattan, and when we were down here in Fayetteville about a year-and-a-half ago, we came across Doe's. At the time I was like, well, let's just move back to Manhattan, because I think it's got a need for a place like this."

Both Lara and Tony said they worked in the restaurant business before deciding to open a Doe's. Lara said Tony has managed at Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbeque and worked at Rock-A-Belly Deli.

Lara said there are about 10 other Doe's Eat Place restaurants with several locations in Arkansas, but the Malleans have opened the northern-most one here in Manhattan.

"There were so many steak houses in Fayetteville, (Ark.), but Doe's was always the best," Lara said. "We thought the concept and the food quality would be a great thing for Manhattan."

soups, gumbo, a kids' menu and steaks. Everything is served by the pound, except for the filets, and all entrees are served with salad, drop biscuits and a choice of red potatoes or fries.

"The food is excellent," Tony said. "It's one of those deals - if you like steak, you'll like this place. It's excellent steak and tamales and shrimp."

The Malleans said they suggest customers come in with friends and split the food since the steaks are large, and the steaks are priced at about $18 per pound.

"Once you see the amount of food you get, it's worth the price," Lara said.

Olympics rank low in Nielsen ratings

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Olympic athletes are having a hard time holding their own against performance prizes.

Nielsen weekly ratings for Feb. 6-12 place Saturday's prime time Winter Olympics on NBC at seventh place.

Olympic ratings were below CSI, Grey's Anatomy and both airings of American Idol.

Crunching the numbers, USA Today said the viewership numbers are down 36 percent from the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City.

For broadcasters and, especially, advertisers, the million dollar question is why are the Olympics' ratings down by almost half from four years ago?

With regards to the youth demographic, the younger generations simply don't have the ties that older generations do, Adrienne Carraway, junior in mass communications, said.

"It's not a big deal anymore to our generation ... they're so enthralled with other things going on in their lives," she said.

But the Winter Olympics are not the only sport suffering from inattention.

The most recent World Series ratings were down four percent from 2004, and Monday Night Football's ratings are down as well, according to the USA Today report.

Some of the ratings' decline might be attributable to on-the-spot updates available through the Internet and many cell phones.

Perhaps more important, the seven-hour time distance between Turin, Italy, and the Little Apple means that many know the results of the competitions before NBC broadcasts them.

"Everybody's on the go and time is of the essence," Carraway said.

Not everyone has given up on the Olympics, though.

Matt Reed, senior in pre-professional construction science and management, has developed an interest in possibly the most joked about of all Olympic sports - women's curling.

For Reed, switching to the Olympics was brought about by a lack of other options.

"I've never been a big winter sports fan," he said. "There's just nothing else on TV."

This year's Winter Olympics are the first Reed has followed.

Reid said he said is unsure whether he will continue to follow them in the future, which is not what the broadcasters and advertisers looking for devoted fans want to hear.

But William Adams, professor of journalism and mass communications, said the problem lies not with the audience but with ineptness on the part of the broadcasters.

"The promotion, I think, was the worst," he said. "For some people, I think this was a surprise that it was an Olympic year."

In addition, the sudden courtship of women viewers in the 18-34 age bracket has led to format changes which alienate some.

There also has been a movement away from human interest reporting and a dearth of coverage concerning the individual athletes and team development.

The seeming golden child of the media, Michelle Kwan, withdrew due to injuries before competition, and there has been little coverage of other athletes in the run up to the games.

Whatever the cause, the 2006 Winter Olympics are losing ground against its prime time competitors at a striking pace, Adams said.

"They're a disaster," Adams said.

MAC offers violin lessons for young musicians

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Arts Center, 1520 Poyntz Ave., offers affordable violin lessons for young students in the community.

Mary Ellen Titus, arts center volunteer, said the program began about 14 years ago when she was teaching at Roosevelt Elementary School.

Titus said she had a class of kindergarten through third-grade students whom she wanted to get involved in the arts.

"I love music," she said. "You can work together as a group, and it teaches discipline."

After talking with Hume Music Inc. in Topeka, Titus said she received enough instruments for her students, ranging from one-eighth to three-fourth sized violins.

Titus said she had a local violin teacher conduct the lessons in her classroom, but after Titus retired, the program eventually evolved into an after-school option. About four years ago, Titus said the program moved to the arts center and is now open to students throughout the community.

Half-hour classes are provided from 4 to 5:30 p.m. Tuesdays at the arts center. With 33 students involved with the program, Titus said she cannot take on any additional students unless they have their own violins.

Many students follow through on the initial contact with the instrument, Titus said, and continue to play.

One of her favorite parts, Titus said, is watching the students learn to work with others.

"Everybody helps everybody else," Titus said. "If you help someone learn something, you learn it better yourself."

Violin lesson costs correlate to the sliding scale used for student lunches, Titus said.

For a student who receives free lunch at school, lessons are $1 per week.

For those who have reduced lunches, lessons cost $3 per week, and those paying for a full lunch, must pay $6 per week for lessons.

Janice Albright teaches the violin lessons at the arts center for the program, but this is not Albright's first time.

Albright said she has given violin lessons since 1962.

Albright said she enjoys working with her young students who are eager to learn.

"They're all too cute, and you just want to hug them," Albright said. "The students are very attentive, and their parents are so supportive."

Learning to play the violin is not the only thing Albright said she wants students to take away from their lessons.

"It teaches them to do more than one thing at a time," Albright said. "Using physical, tactile, ear and sight. They use four things at one time."

Penny Senften, director of the arts center, said the low-cost lessons provide an opportunity many students would not normally be able to have.

"The main thing that I see is most of the kids couldn't have violin lessons at all," Senften said. "This is a very affordable way."

Senften said the arts center's statement focuses on the concept of providing the arts for people of all ages, and this opportunity makes that possible.

"We offer high-quality arts at affordable prices," she said. "We're very keen on getting the arts to kids."

Students donate plasma for cash

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many K-State students have found an unusual way to make extra cash — donate plasma.

Manhattan residents can donate plasma, the liquid portion of blood, and get paid for it, through ZLB Plasma Service, 1130 Garden Way.

"Well, I'm an RA, and so honestly, we're not supposed to have another job more than 10 hours outside per week, so I just initially did this for a little bit of extra cash," said Kyle Baack, senior in music education, who has been donating plasma for about a year.

ZLB is an international plasma collection organization that operates more than 60 collection centers in the United States and eight in Germany.

According to www.zlbplasma.com, the company collects about 2.5 million liters annually.

Plasma donors must be 18 years old, weigh at least 110 pounds, be in good health and meet proper identification and residency requirements, the Web site said.

Laboratory tests screen the donated plasma for viruses before donating, and plasma collection is a sterile process that takes 45-60 minutes.

Donors can donate plasma a maximum of two times per week and are divided into different weight classes that specify how much money they make and how much plasma they give, said Nick Felder, freshman in chemical engineering.

Felder, who has a part-time job, said he began donating plasma at the beginning of the school year for extra money.

"All of the money from my job I save, and this I use for pocket money, pizza, clothes, things like that," Felder said.

It also is important to be well-nourished and prepared for the donation, Baack said.

"You want to make sure that you've been drinking water and that you're really hydrated, and you want to make sure you've had a good meal beforehand," he said.

Baack said he has had some interesting experiences during his time as a donor.

"The first time I didn't know I had to drink a lot of water first, which isn't a good idea," he said. "I got really lightheaded."

However, other donors said they have not experienced any trouble while making donations, and the procedure usually goes smoothly.

"I haven't had any problems at all," Alex Dalke, freshman in mechanical engineering, said.

Dalke began donating plasma about one month ago and said he makes an average of about $55 on weeks when he donates twice.

Dalke said donating plasma has been a good way to make extra money because the hours are flexible.

He said he would recommend it to other students.

"If they don't mind needles," he said.

Kline's office reports fundraising violation, faces potential fine

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Invitations to a fundraising event for Attorney General Phill Kline apparently went to some lobbyists, despite a state law prohibiting such solicitations while the Kansas Legislature is in session, Kline's office has disclosed.

Spokesman Whitney Watson said Monday that the incident resulted from an "honest mistake" by a consulting firm handling the mailing of invitations. The event is set for Feb. 28 in Wichita and is to feature former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Watson told the Lawrence Journal-World that the attorney general's office reported the problem to the state Governmental Ethics Commission, which enforces campaign finance laws. Watson added that Kline's office is cooperating with the commission's staff.

Carol Williams, the commission's executive director, declined to say whether the matter is being investigated. Investigations don't typically become public until the staff files a complaint and a public hearing is scheduled.

Someone who violates the law against soliciting donations from lobbyists while legislators are in session could be fined $5,000.

Last year, Sen. Kay O'Connor, R-Olathe, paid a $3,000 fine, though she acknowledged no intent to raise money with a letter that some lobbyists received.

But Rep. Ray Merrick, R-Stilwell, was fined only $1 last year after acknowledging a fundraising letter was sent early by his wife.

Merrick also reported the problem to the commission himself and cooperated with its investigation.

Russians win ice dancing, U.S. takes silver

By Barry Wilner
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TURIN, Italy — At last, a figure skating medal for the United States — in ice dancing, of all things. And yet another Olympic gold for Russia.

Tanith Belbin and partner Ben Agosto snapped the U.S. medals drought in figure skating with a silver Monday night. They were behind Tatiana Navka and Roman Kostomarov, who gave Russia a gold medal hat trick — pairs, men's and dance.

No nation has swept the four skating events in one games, and Russian Irina Slutskaya is favored in the women's competition.

"I am extremely proud that we've been able to achieve this for our country," said the Canadian-born Belbin, who became a U.S. citizen on Dec. 31.

"It's only our first Olympics. We're competing with second- and third-time Olympians, so this is great to come here and get a medal the first time out when we didn't even know we'd be here.

"Can't ask for more."

Belbin and Agosto won the first dance medal for the United States since a bronze in 1976 by Colleen O'Connor and Jim Millns, and only the second medal of any kind. It also is the only medal for American figure skaters at these Olympics.

Elena Grushina and Russian Goncharov of Ukraine won the bronze.

All three couples performed with poise and style. Even better, nobody crashed to the ice.

Sunday's original dance was marred by falls and an injury that forced the top Canadians out of the free dance. Italian favorites Barbara Fusar Poli and Maurizio Margaglio were back, friends again, after their flop and subsequent venomous staredown.

"We are like brother and sister," Fusar Poli said. "We were angry at ourselves, but between each other everything is OK."

Not only were they OK on ice, but they kissed and made up after four minutes of tense skating featuring some intricate lifts and carries.

She put her arm around his shoulder as they sat next to each other this time, observing their mediocre scores that placed them sixth.

Those marks were in sharp contrast to the winners, whose 200.64 total was the only one over 200 points and won by 4.58 over Belbin and Agosto.

Americans Melissa Gregory and Denis Petukhov were 14th, and Jamie Silverstein and Ryan O'Meara finished 16th.

"I'm happy we performed well and all of our hard work this year has been accomplished," said Petukhov, who was born in Russia and became a U.S. citizen a year ago.

Petukhov and his wife will stick around for a shot at the 2010 Vancouver Games.

"Yes," he said, "we're going for gold."

Their biggest competition could be their countrymen; Belbin is 21, Agosto 24.

Rising stars in the sport since 2000, Belbin and Agos-to's silver medal at last year's world championships marked them as contenders.

When Belbin became eligible to compete for the U.S. seven weeks ago, their Olympic schedule was pushed up four years.

Although Belbin and Agosto have won three U.S. titles, they were barred from the Olympics until she got her citizenship — all U.S. competitors must be Americans.

They paid back everyone who sped up the naturalization process, surging from sixth after compulsories to second through the original dance.

The couple remained in second with a passionate flamenco free skate that far surpassed their program at nationals, but was not completely clean, and certainly was not in the same league as Navka and Kostomarov's playful routine to "Carmen."

No matter. Considering where U.S. dance has been — or hasn't been — through the last three decades, silver was just super.

Underground sounds provide officials hope

By Oliver Teves
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GUINSAUGON, Philippines — The sounds were tantalizing. Scratching and rhythmic tapping. And the farther rescuers descended into the wet muck, the louder they became.

Nearly four days after a mountainside collapsed and covered this farming village in up to 100 feet of mud, seismic sensors and sound-detection gear brought in by U.S. and Malaysian forces picked up what officials hoped were cries for help deep inside a buried elementary school.

"To me, that's more than enough reason to smile and be happy," South Leyte Gov. Rosette Lerias said Monday. "The adrenaline is high ... now that we have seen increasing signs of life."

Still, it was hard to imagine there were survivors. No one has been pulled out alive since just a few hours after the Friday morning landslide, which killed up to 1,000 people.

The search has focused on the school because of unconfirmed reports that some of the 250-300 children and teachers may have sent cell phone text messages to relatives soon after the disaster.

Under the glare of generator-powered lights, a multinational group of troops and technicians used high-tech gear like seismic sensors and sound- and heat-detection equipment alongside shovels and rescue dogs. They finally halted about 3 a.m. Tuesday until daybreak.

A U.S. military spokesman said late Monday that U.S. Marines digging at the site had found bodies, but no survivors.

"I asked had they received or found any type of survivors, and the answer was no," U.S. Marine Capt. Burrell Parmer said after speaking to the commander of U.S. forces at the disaster site.

The statement discounted an earlier report by Philippine Interior Undersecretary Marius Corpus that U.S. Marines had found 50 survivors. There was no immediate explanation for how the false report had spread.

"There is a lot of rubble, a lot of large boulders," Parmer said. "On some sides near the river, it's very moist, very soft soil, and you can get stuck up to ... your waistline if you're not careful."

Still, the Marines were eager to discover the origin of sounds detected by sensors.

"The farther down we went, the signals grew stronger," U.S. Marine Lt. Richard Neikirk said as he pointed to a spot under a big boulder.

A Malaysian team using sound-detection gear picked up noises, too.

"We have a sound," said Sahar Yunos of the Malaysia Disaster and Rescue Team. "Knocking, something like that."

A rescue dog also stopped three times at one spot away from where rescue workers were digging.

There was no visible sign of the school. Rescue workers were digging at two places — one where the school was believed to have sat close to the mountain, the other 200 yards down the hill, where the landslide could have carried it.

Dozens of U.S. Marines and Philippine soldiers, along with local miners, were digging in a watery, boulder-strewn spot around the school's original site, using shovels on the muck and moving it with body bags, while draining the murky water in large bottles.

The search was a painstaking process as the crews went yard by yard. At one of the highest points, local troops planted a Philippine flag.

The Marines were from the five-man Third Intelligence Ground Sensor platoon, accompanied by 15 armed Marines.

They deployed nine seismic sensors that can detect vibrations underground. With everyone standing still, one man then used a steel bar to hit on a rock several times and waited for any kind of response underground.

Four sensors detected some "noise" or vibration, but the men could not tell what it was.

They were followed by the 15-man Malaysian team using sensor gear called Delsar and employing similar techniques.

Five Taiwanese, who brought heat-imaging equipment, arrived to check for signs of life, too. Rescuers radioed for water pumps and floodlights to continue working after dark.

Bush: U.S. nears energy progress

By Deb Riechmann
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MILWAUKEE — Saying the nation is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that would "startle" most Americans, President Bush on Monday outlined his energy proposals to help wean the country off foreign oil.

Less than half the crude oil used by refineries is produced in the United States, while 60 percent comes from foreign nations, Bush said during the first stop on a two-day trip to talk about energy.

Some foreign suppliers have "unstable" governments that have fundamental differences with America, he said.

"It creates a national security issue, and we're held hostage for energy by foreign nations that may not like us," Bush said.

Bush is focusing on energy at a time when Americans are paying high power bills to heat their homes this winter and have only recently seen a decrease in gasoline prices.

One of Bush's proposals would expand research into smaller, longer-lasting batteries for electric-gas hybrid cars. He highlighted that initiative with a visit Monday to the battery center at Milwaukee-based auto-parts supplier Johnson Controls Inc.

During his trip, Bush is also focusing on a proposal to increase investment in development of clean electric power sources, and proposals to speed the development of biofuels such as "cellulosic" ethanol made from wood chips or sawgrass.

Energy conservation groups and environmentalists say they're pleased that the president, a former oil man in Texas, is stressing alternative sources of energy, but they contend his proposals don't go far enough. They say the administration must consider greater fuel-efficiency standards for cars, and some economists believe it's best to increase the gas tax to force consumers to change their driving habits.

During his visit to Johnson Controls' new hybrid battery laboratory, Bush checked out two Ford Escapes — one with a nickel-metal-hybrid battery, the kind that powers most hybrid-electric vehicles, and one with a lithium-ion battery, which Johnson Controls believes are the wave of the future. The lithium-ion battery was about half the size of the older-model battery. In 2004, Johnson Controls received a government contract to develop the lithium-ion batteries.

On Tuesday, Bush plans to visit the Energy Department's National Renewable Energy Laboratory in Golden, Colo., to talk about speeding the development of biofuels.

The lab, with a looming $28 million budget shortfall, had announced it was cutting its staff by 32 people, including eight researchers. But in advance of Bush's visit, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman directed the transfer of $5 million to the private contractor that runs the lab to save the jobs.

The department "has been informed that the NREL lab director will use these funds to immediately restore all of the jobs that were cut earlier this month due to budget shortfalls," the department said in a statement Monday.

"Our nation is on the threshold of new energy technology that I think will startle the American people," Bush said. "We're on the edge of some amazing breakthroughs — breakthroughs all aimed at enhancing our national security and our economic security and the quality of life of the folks who live here in the United States."

Later Monday, Bush visited the United Solar Ovonic plant, which makes solar panels, in Auburn Hills, Mich., outside Detroit.

"This technology right here is going to help us change the way we live in our homes," Bush said.

Bush said he was impressed with the growing commercial uses of solar energy.

"Roof makers will one day be able to make a solar roof that protects you from the elements and at the same time, powers your house," Bush said. "The vision is this — that technology will become so efficient that you'll become a little power generator in your home, and if you don't use the energy you generate you'll be able to feed it back into the electricity grid."

selves, but I think there are some exceptions," Blank said.

Plan B costs $20 at Lafene and $41.99 at Walgreens.

Barr Laboratories, the manufacturer of Plan B, has petitioned to the FDA to allow the pills to be sold without a prescription, as they are in other countries like England and Canada.

Eight states — Alaska, California, Maine, Massachusetts, Hawaii, New Hampshire, New Mexico and Washington — allow women to obtain EC directly from a pharmacist without a prescription, according to the American Guttmacher Institute, a reproductive health research group.

Women can obtain Plan B during an appointment at Planned Parenthood clinics.

"This is easier because a lot of pharmacies don't carry it," said Amanda Sheridan, community educator for Planned Parenthood.

"Even if they're willing to supply it, they don't always have it in stock," she said.

Some pharmacists' reluctance to provide Plan B has been an issue in recent news.

Walgreens' policy states that individual pharmacists have the right to decline to fill a prescription if they have a moral objection, but they must refer it to another employee or pharmacy that will.

"The pharmacist can step out of the way, but they can't step in the way," said Tiffani Bruce, manager of media relations for Walgreens. "The store manager's job is to make sure the patient's taken care of before leaving out store."

Target's pharmacy has a similar policy.

According to a media statement from Target on Nov. 10, 2005, if a pharmacist has a moral conflict with filling a prescription for Plan B, he or she required to ensure the guest's prescription is filled in a timely and respectful manner by another pharmacist or pharmacy.

The National Conference of State Legislatures reported in June 2005 that at least five states — California, Missouri, New Jersey, West Virginia and Illinois — have introduced measures that would require pharmacists to fill all prescriptions.

"The best thing a woman can do is to make an appointment at Lafene and get the information," Kennedy said. "We have an excellent education opportunity. They can learn what's available and how to protect themselves."

"I assume everyone will be sexually active at some point. About 80 percent of the student population is sexually active, and this applies to K-State students."

ARREST | Lemon not linked to other rapes

a knife to gain entry into her apartment and raped her.

After a brief foot chase, Lemon was detained and, as a result of the investigation, was positively identified as the assailant, Grubbs said.

"Officers were able to obtain direct evidence linking him to the rape," Grubbs said.

Grubbs declined to elaborate on the evidence, other than to say it was from one of the homes.

He was charged with aggravated kidnapping, aggravated criminal sodomy, rape, aggravated burglary, attempted aggravated burglary, aggravated robbery and aggravated assault.

He also was arrested on a misdemeanor charge of criminal use of a weapon.

There is no link between this case and the previous series of rapes in Manhattan, Grubbs said.

Bond was set at $250,000.

PORN | Fehr: New evidence in Parks and Rec case 'disturbing'

The software provides a forensic means of going back and looking at files on the hard drive, as well as whether they have been deleted.

"I can find just about anything on the computer that has been or is there," RCPD Det. Brad Schlerf said.

A search warrant was issued for Utermohlen's home, and a search has been conducted.

There are no additional charges resulting from that warrant, Grubbs said.

"Obviously, we find this latest discovery disturbing and very disgusting," City Manager Ron Fehr said.

The city recently purchased software to block access to pornographic Web sites and plans to better monitor use of city computers, Fehr said.

Utermohlen's computer was password-protected, but Fehr didn't know if anyone else was able to access the computer.

"I won't rule it out," Fehr said. "He did share an office."

The city of Manhattan now is checking other departments' computer records, including those of Parks and Recreation, Fehr said.

While Utermohlen's position with Parks and Recreation was recreation coordinator for adult recreation, he did assist with youth tournaments, Fehr said.

"It was not his primary responsibility," Fehr said.

The child pornography Utermohlen is accused of accessing was on the Internet and didn't involve any local children, Mike Watson, director of the RCPD.

"It doesn't involve anyone here in Manhattan," Watson said.

of them seeing the results and hearing feedback from Marcos and also them thinking of what they are capable of caused them to decide to make the adjustments."

The No. 1 doubles tandem of Simosa and freshman Katerina Kudlackova were up 5-4 against Anastasia Sourkova and Jennifer Miccoli before losing 8-4.

Simosa said failures in previous outings served as a wake-up call.

"Me and (Kudlackova) talked that night between the matches and figured out what was going wrong because at Texas Tech it didn't go well for us, and it didn't go well against Utah, so we knew that things were going to be tougher against BYU," Simosa said.

Klimova was a bright spot for the weekend, winning all her matches in singles and doubles play. Klimova tore her ACL against BYU last year.

"She's still not where she wants to be, and she's not where I think she can be," Bietau said. "It's been a long, hard struggle, so it's nice to get reinforced every once in a while to let you know that you're going the right way."

Focusing on the match was a key point of emphasis, Klimova said.

in a fight — Tom Selleck, Craig Stadler and Burt Reynolds, or Bob Saget, Gene Wilder and Phil Mickelson? That was a rhetorical question.

The most compelling NCAA tale lies in one of the all-time greatest winners and upcoming top-3 picks in this year's NFL draft.

USC quarterback Matt Leinart won all but one game as a starting quarterback, though on most days he looked like something that had just emerged from the forest. People thought he was lazy with facial tailoring. Three full years he sported a scruff, and three full years he did not lose. College's golden child. Then what happened? He shaves his face just days before the final game of his career, the National Championship, and clean-shaven Matt Leinart loses.

Some say you can't judge a man by the size of his mustache, and I say they're wrong.

In today's highly-competitive society, a little "man piece" can add a much needed lift to the daily struggle with mediocrity. It is the difference between Warren Moon being sworn into the Hall of Fame last week as gritty and Troy Aikman being sworn in as pretty.

I started growing my secret weapon for this spring's intramural softball season back in November, and it's almost ready to impose its will on the unsuspecting Section IV Class B Softball League.

Senate to consider DNA bill

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A bill that would require a convicted felon to submit a DNA sample was passed out of the House Judiciary Committee on Thursday.

House Bill No. 2554 should be in senate by the end of this week, said Rep. Kevin Yoder (R-Overland Park).

The bill will provide a useful tool for law enforcement to solve crimes committed by a repeat offender, said Yoder, co-sponsor of the bill and member of the House Judiciary Committee.

"DNA is like the modern-day fingerprint," Yoder said. "It allows us to solve crimes and do a much better job of solving crimes that were previously unsolvable."

Under provisions of the bill, those convicted of a felony would have their DNA submitted to a database. Police can collect evidence from the scene, run it through a DNA test and match the DNA to the person previously convicted, if someone were to commit another crime.

"This is a pretty big deal to help reduce crime in Kansas," Yoder said.

Rep. Deena Horst (R-Salina) said this bill would help put repeat offenders behind bars.

"We have discovered that many of the same criminals who have been found guilty and charged with burglary are also guilty of raping someone, or something of that sort," said Horst, co-signer of the bill. "This is a way to solve some cases, and it will help keep criminals behind bars longer."

The bill originally stated that if offenders refuse to submit a DNA sample they would be charged with a felony. After discussions within the committee, the content of the bill was changed so the refusal to submit a DNA sample is a misdemeanor offense.

Yoder said he opposed the change.

"I think if someone refuses to give a DNA test then they are potentially avoiding being matched up with a serious felony," Yoder said. "There is no good reason to refuse unless they are avoiding prosecution of other crimes."

Yoder said lessening the charges involved with refusal could keep offenders from submitting DNA samples.

"It seems to me that if they were facing a felony they may be unlikely to refuse to take Fun, happy and selfless is how many people would describe Sarah Watt.

"She's pretty much a legend for everyone that knows her," said John Linder, junior in graphic design. "She cared about so many people and so many things."

Watt, junior in life sciences, died early Sunday morning after she was ejected from the vehicle in which she was riding.

"I'm still getting over the shock of it," said Clint Franey, senior in interior architecture. "It's hard to believe she's gone."

Franey and Linder said they were close friends with Sarah and described her as someone who always found a reason to be happy.

"She was a fun person who always wanted to make everyone's day better and would do whatever it took and still be happy,"

Franey said.

Watt was the kind of person who everyone felt close to, Linder said.

"If you were with Sarah, you couldn't go anywhere without running into somebody or having somebody come over to say 'Hi,'" he said.

Watt's kindness went beyond friendliness, Franey said.

"She gave her car away once because one of her friends needed it," he said. "If you were a good friend, she would do anything for you."

Animals were also important to Watts, Linder said.

"She would take in any animal if it needed a home," he said. "I'm going to take care of her hedgehog."

Linder said he hopes people remember Watt how she was when she was with her friends.

"She was the life of the party, the center of attention. She didn't have to be, she didn't try to be, but she always was," he said.

Since Watt's death, a Facebook.com group, "The Best FKing Friend Ever, Sarah Watt," and a memorial Web site have been made in her honor.

A memorial service for family and friends of Watt will be at 7 p.m. Thursday at Stewart Funeral Home, 4370 Salzer Road, Wamego, Kan.

Linder said the family asked those attending the service to wear pink, Watt's favorite color.

"She always wore it," he said. "She even tried to get me to wear a pink shirt."

Linder said the family requested that instead of flowers, donations should be made to the T. Russell Reitz Animal Shelter or to the Wamego Community Foundation for the Sarah Watt Scholarship Fund.

Presidential candidates discuss parking, tuition, housing

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The eight candidates for student body president met Tuesday in the Union Courtyard to address questions in one minute from moderator Aaron Leiker with KMAN-AM 1350. Three issues discussed were tuition, parking and housing.

TUITION

Candidates were asked what they would do to control tuition increases.

Candidate Chris Gigstad said he does not want to see tuition increase more than it needs to.

"It's gone up the last few years, and we'd like to get the students' voice and keep that level," Gigstad said.

Candidate Ashley Boldt said there is a partnership with the Kansas Board of Regents and administration in working to control tuition increases.

"(We're for) understanding the partnership and looking for new alternatives to making sure tuition isn't just skyrocketing out of the ballpark," Boldt said.

Candidate John Wallisch said he had no comment on tuition increase.

Candidate Amanda Hoffman said she is interested in starting a program using community and private sector cooperation. The program would get scholarships for students as they start college from companies in their major, she said.

"(It) ultimately would result in internships and eventually in jobs (students) can get," Hoffman said. "In the process of that, it would offset the cost of the tuition anyway."

Candidate Matt King said he supports the Tuition Task Force that was formed last semester. The group has worked for several months in determining how much students would pay in tuition over the next five years, he said.

"We want to work with that group and make sure student interests are protected," King said.

Candidate Ryan Collett said any increase in tuition should be proportional to a student's academic year.

Elections '06

Voting for SGA primary elections begins Feb. 28 and ends March 1. Vote at sgaelections.k-state.edu.

For example, freshmen would pay 100 percent of the increase, and it would decrease 10 percent as students moved up their academic careers, Collett said.

Candidate Lucas Maddy said when the Tuition Task Force releases its recommendation for tuition costs, the student body president should follow through with the recommendation.

"It is something we need to follow because that is the student voice and the administration's voice," Maddy said.

Candidate Zach Hauser said he supports the contracted tuition approach that student leaders and administration are pursuing right now.

Supreme Court to take on partial-birth abortion ban issue

By Gina Holland
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court said Tuesday it will consider the constitutionality of banning a type of late-term abortion, teeing up a contentious issue for a new-look court already in a state of flux over privacy rights.

The Bush administration has pressed the high court to reinstate the federal law, passed in 2003 but never put in effect because it was struck down by judges in California, Nebraska and New York.

The outcome will likely rest with the two men that President Bush has recently installed on the court. Justices had been split 5-4 in 2000 in striking down a state law, barring what critics call partial birth abortion because it lacked an exception to protect the health of the mother.

But Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was the tie-breaking vote, retired late last month and was replaced by Samuel Alito. Abortion had been a major focus in the fight over Alito's nomination because justices serve for life and he surely will help shape the court on abortion and other issues for the next generation.

Alito, in his rulings on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia, has been more willing than O'Connor, the first woman justice, to allow restrictions on abortions, which were legalized in the Roe v. Wade decision in 1973.

The federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act prohibits a certain type of abortion, generally carried out in the second or third trimester, in which a fetus is partially removed from the womb, and the skull is punctured or crushed.

Justices on a 9-0 vote in a New Hampshire case reaffirmed in January that states can require parental involvement in abortion decisions, and that state restrictions must have an exception to protect the mother's health.

The federal law in the current case has no health exception, but defenders maintain that the procedure is never medically necessary to protect a woman's health.

Even with O'Connor's retirement, there are five votes to uphold Roe, the landmark ruling that established a woman's right to an abortion.

Alito's views "are not going to change the outcome of the central principle of Roe v. Wade," said John Garvey, the dean at Boston College Law School. "In some ways, these are tokens or markers in ... a symbolic tug of war."

Bush has called the so-called partial birth abortion an "abhorrent practice," and his Supreme Court lawyer, Solicitor General Paul Clement, had urged justices not to delay taking up the administration's appeal.

The case that will be heard this fall comes to the Supreme Court from Nebraska, where the federal law was challenged on behalf of physicians. Doctors who perform the procedure contend that it is the safest method of abortion when the mother's health is threatened by heart disease, high blood pressure or cancer.

Students work on solar house

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A group of K-State students will combine their knowledge and understanding of building and power in an attempt to create an aesthetically attractive and energy-efficient solar structure.

Ruth Miller, associate professor of electrical and computer engineering, said teams across the country apply to compete in the Department of Energy's Solar Decathlon. This will be K-State's first year to compete in the competition.

"We basically have two years to construct an 800-square-foot house entirely powered with solar power," Miller said.

After two years of designing, building and working, the team has to move their creation to Washington, D.C., for a national exhibition.

Miller said about 40 students are involved in K-State's group, Project Solar House, including students studying architecture, engineering and even business.

Miller said contest rules state the structure must be furnished with a variety of practical commodities, including a washer, dryer and a computer.

The building must run the items with solar energy.

"It's scary what we have to get done in two years," Miller said. "I don't really know what we're going to end up with."

Groups also are required to create a solar-powered vehicle, which Miller has helped develop in previous competitions at K-State. Although she has had experience creating a solar car, Miller said she wants to have students bring new ideas.

"I try to let the students try anything novel," she said. "We let the students lead the way."

As president of Project Solar House, Breanne Sparrow, senior in architecture, said she thought the project will bring public awareness about the need to conserve resources.

"Solar power can be for more than just at the high end," Sparrow said. "We hope to make it more affordable and show what the possibilities could be."

When working with fellow students, Sparrow said she wants her peers to take away a sense of accomplishment through teamwork.

"I would really like them to learn how to do it from all aspects and work as a team from all disciplines," Sparrow said.

This semester, Sparrow said the group is concentrating

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Grant McGill, senior in architecture, explains his group's solar house design during a meeting Monday night in Seaton Hall.

on design and will move into developing the specific construction concept in the fall. Sparrow said actual construction of the building will begin in spring 2007.

Todd Gabbard, assistant professor of architecture, said in the past, wind energy has been one of the main resources people think available in Kansas, but power from the sun's rays is also a possibility.

"Frankly, Kansas has great potential for solar energy," Gabbard said.

Gabbard said the chance to work on Project Solar House gives students a hands-on experience to relate classroom lessons to real life scenarios.

"I think they're really excited about it," Gabbard said. "It's one of those opportunities where you get to apply what you've learned."

After the competition in fall 2007, Gabbard said the group wants to bring the solar house back to the K-State campus to be put on display for study.

"The availability of energy, we need to look into alternatives," he said. "We'll be making a transition from fossil fuels to renewable energy, and the sooner we address, the easier the transition will be."

Study finds link between aggression, violence in media

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Watching violent media content might have harmful biological effects on the brain, according to research published by a K-State professor.

John Murray, professor of family studies and human services, recently completed a 10-year study of the effects of violent images on children's brains.

"That is an extraordinary amount of time, but there were many extenuating circumstances in developing this study," Murray said. "This was the first time anyone attempted to conduct brain imaging and video violence research."

Murray and his team of researchers showed children between the ages of 8 and 13 a violent boxing clip from the film "Rocky IV" while scanning their brain using a Magnetic Resonance Imaging machine.

The MRI scans showed that watching the clip activated several areas of the brain involved in fear response, including the amygdala, which alerts the body to danger in the environment, and the posterior cingulate, which stores traumatic events to long-term memory.

The violent scene also triggered activity in the brain's premotor cortex. Murray said that while the children could not move inside the MRI machine, this activity indicates the children were thinking about imitating the boxing moves they saw in the movie.

Researchers at the University of Missouri and Michigan State University also completed studies similar to Murray's and arrived at the same conclusion: children recognize, remember, and even imitate or rehearse violent behavior seen in video games, films and TV shows.

"We did not know about the other research projects," Murray said. "These were all developed independently and came together at the right moment."

Murray's study is a part of a joint project shared by K-State and Harvard Medical School.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services recently allocated another $500,000 to the universities to continue studying brain imaging and video violence.

Melanie Hammeke, senior in food and nutrition-exercise science, said she agreed with the study's conclusion that violent media content was harmful to children.

"In some of those games, you can kill people and hire prostitutes," she said. "The games give kids ideas, and that's where actions come from — ideas."

Matt Fallesen, graduate student in music, said the growing amount of time children spend watching television makes them more susceptible to the medium's violent content.

"I think almost everybody is visual to a certain extent, especially kids," he said. "They are more easily influenced, and these images will very likely be imprinted and replayed in their minds."

Fallesen said more regulation on content in the entertainment industry may be the best way to stop the decline of nonviolent programming and games.

"There's more and more questionable stuff on TV every year," Fallesen said. "Without regulation, I think some things will get out of hand, and that some things may have already gotten way out of hand."

Senate Operations might combine committees

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senate Operations Committee met Tuesday night to discuss the proposed legislation of the bylaws amendments concerning the Student Affairs and Social Services Committee, the Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee and the Faculty Senate Representative.

The constitutional and bylaws amendments were moved to stay in committee, and will be further discussed at the Feb. 28 Senate Operations Committee meeting.

According to the University Committee Handbook, the Student Affairs and Social Services Committee shall be concerned with all matters involving the welfare of the student body. The Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee shall be responsible for all academic issues and good relations between K-State faculty and SGA.

Senate Vice-Chair Emily Besler said she saw both committees struggle to find projects to fill their time when she was Student Affairs and Social Services Chair two years ago.

"In serving as Vice Chair this year, we are always struggling to find people to serve on committees, and we run really thin on all of our committees," Besler said. "SASS and Academic Affairs take a lot of man power."

Budget also is an issue the two committees have dealt with in the past, Besler said.

"(We're) funded under OSAS office budget, and we're continually strained every year because there are so many projects to try to cover," she said.

Besler said one of the few drawbacks of combining the committees would be losing a committee chair.

Student Senate Faculty Representative Bill Muir said the two committees are not able to get the attention of the legislative branch, the executive branch, or the coordinator of student activities.

"Quite frankly, those people control how resources are allocated specific ways," Muir said.

Student Affairs and Social Services Chair Jim Mosimann said the committee would receive clout if it could establish a budget.

"People would be a little more willing to help us," he said.

DIVERSIONS

A waste of time — but hey, it's better than lecture

You know you're a '90s kid if you...

Have ever ended a sentence with the word "PSYCHE!"

Remember going to the skating rink before there were inline skates.

Can rap the entire "The Fresh Prince Of Bel Air" theme song.

Have worn skorts and felt stylish.

Yearned to be part of the Baby-Sitters Club (we even had a club!).

Used to love playing with your My Little Pet Shop.

Know that "WHOa" comes from Joey from "Blossom" and that "How Rude!" comes from Stephanie from "Full House."

Remember when it actually was worth getting up early on a Saturday to watch cartoons.

Wore a ponytail on the side of your head and had fluffed bangs.

Got super excited when it was Oregon Trail day in computer class at school.

Wanted to change your name to "JEM" in kindergarten.

Remember reading "Goosebumps."

Know the profound meaning of "Wax on, wax off."

Have pondered why Smurfette was the only female smurf.

Took plastic cartoon lunch boxes to school.

Remember the craze, and subsequent banning, of slap bracelets and slam books.

Still get the urge to say "NOT" after (almost) every sentence ... Not ...

Watched "Tiny Toons" or "Muppet Babies."

Were a boy who wore pink.

Knew that Kimberly, the pink ranger, and Tommy, the green ranger, were meant to be together.

Know that the best friend coming through the window on a ladder originated on "Clarissa Explains It All," not on "Dawson's Creek."

Remember "I've fallen and I can't get up."

Ever got injured on a Slip 'n' Slide.

Knew what it meant to say "Care Bear Stare."

Wore socks over leggings scrunched down.

Wore Chucks in kindergarten.

Remember boom boxes versus compact disc players.

Had to pay for the Disney Channel.

Remember Alf, the little brown alien from Melmac and Vicki the Robot from "My Little Wonder."

Watched "90210" or "Melrose Place" with your mother.

Remember New Kids on The Block when they were cool.

Knew all the characters names and their life stories on "Saved By The Bell."

Played with and/or collected Pogs.

Owned a Skip It.

Chewed on Major League bubble gum and pretended you were a baseball player chewing tobacco.

Had school supplies that were all the Lisa Frank brand.

Watched the original "Care Bears," "My Little Pony," and "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles."

Used to wear those stick-on earrings, not only on your ears, but at the corners of your eyes.

Remember a time before the WB.

Watched "Wild and Crazy Kids" on Nickelodeon.

Have gotten creeped out by "Are You Afraid of the Dark?"

Thought it would be so cool to be Alex Mack.

Know the Macarena by heart.

"Talk to the hand" ... enough said.

Thought Brain would finally take over the world ... and Dot truly was the cutest.

Students work on solar house

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A group of K-State students will combine their knowledge and understanding of building and power in an attempt to create an aesthetically attractive and energy-efficient solar structure.

Ruth Miller, associate professor of electrical and computer engineering, said teams across the country apply to compete in the Department of Energy's Solar Decathlon. This will be K-State's first year to compete in the competition.

"We basically have two years to construct an 800-square-foot house entirely powered with solar power," Miller said.

After two years of designing, building and working, the team has to move their creation to Washington, D.C., for a national exhibition.

Miller said about 40 students are involved in K-State's group, Project Solar House, including students studying architecture, engineering and even business.

Miller said contest rules state the structure must be furnished with a variety of practical commodities, including a washer, dryer and a computer.

The building must run the items with solar energy.

"It's scary what we have to get done in two years," Miller said. "I don't really know what we're going to end up with."

Groups also are required to create a solar-powered vehicle, which Miller has helped develop in previous competitions at K-State. Although she has had experience creating a solar car, Miller said she wants to have students bring new ideas.

"I try to let the students try anything novel," she said. "We let the students lead the way."

As president of Project Solar House, Breanne Sparrow, senior in architecture, said she thought the project will bring public awareness about the need to conserve resources.

"Solar power can be for more than just at the high end," Sparrow said. "We hope to make it more affordable and show what the possibilities could be."

When working with fellow students, Sparrow said she wants her peers to take away a sense of accomplishment through teamwork.

"I would really like them to learn how to do it from all aspects and work as a team from all disciplines," Sparrow said.

This semester, Sparrow said the group is concentrating

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Grant McGill, senior in architecture, explains his group's solar house design during a meeting Monday night in Seaton Hall.

on design and will move into developing the specific construction concept in the fall. Sparrow said actual construction of the building will begin in spring 2007.

Todd Gabbard, assistant professor of architecture, said in the past, wind energy has been one of the main resources people think available in Kansas, but power from the sun's rays is also a possibility.

"Frankly, Kansas has great potential for solar energy," Gabbard said.

Gabbard said the chance to work on Project Solar House gives students a hands-on experience to relate classroom lessons to real life scenarios.

"I think they're really excited about it," Gabbard said. "It's one of those opportunities where you get to apply what you've learned."

After the competition in fall 2007, Gabbard said the group wants to bring the solar house back to the K-State campus to be put on display for study.

"The availability of energy, we need to look into alternatives," he said. "We'll be making a transition from fossil fuels to renewable energy, and the sooner we address, the easier the transition will be."

Study finds link between aggression, violence in media

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Watching violent media content might have harmful biological effects on the brain, according to research published by a K-State professor.

John Murray, professor of family studies and human services, recently completed a 10-year study of the effects of violent images on children's brains.

"That is an extraordinary amount of time, but there were many extenuating circumstances in developing this study," Murray said. "This was the first time anyone attempted to conduct brain imaging and video violence research."

Murray and his team of researchers showed children between the ages of 8 and 13 a violent boxing clip from the film "Rocky IV" while scanning their brain using a Magnetic Resonance Imaging machine.

The MRI scans showed that watching the clip activated several areas of the brain involved in fear response, including the amygdala, which alerts the body to danger in the environment, and the posterior cingulate, which stores traumatic events to long-term memory.

The violent scene also triggered activity in the brain's premotor cortex. Murray said that while the children could not move inside the MRI machine, this activity indicates the children were thinking about imitating the boxing moves they saw in the movie.

Researchers at the University of Missouri and Michigan State University also completed studies similar to Murray's and arrived at the same conclusion: children recognize, remember, and even imitate or rehearse violent behavior seen in video games, films and TV shows.

"We did not know about the other research projects," Murray said. "These were all developed independently and came together at the right moment."

Murray's study is a part of a joint project shared by K-State and Harvard Medical School.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services recently allocated another $500,000 to the universities to continue studying brain imaging and video violence.

Melanie Hammeke, senior in food and nutrition-exercise science, said she agreed with the study's conclusion that violent media content was harmful to children.

"In some of those games, you can kill people and hire prostitutes," she said. "The games give kids ideas, and that's where actions come from — ideas."

Matt Fallesen, graduate student in music, said the growing amount of time children spend watching television makes them more susceptible to the medium's violent content.

"I think almost everybody is visual to a certain extent, especially kids," he said. "They are more easily influenced, and these images will very likely be imprinted and replayed in their minds."

Fallesen said more regulation on content in the entertainment industry may be the best way to stop the decline of nonviolent programming and games.

"There's more and more questionable stuff on TV every year," Fallesen said. "Without regulation, I think some things will get out of hand, and that some things may have already gotten way out of hand."

TO THE POINT Talking about media violence is parent's duty

The old adage of "guns don't kill people – people kill people" applies to the media, as well.

By themselves and in moderation, video games and violent movies and television are harmless, as long as one can make the distinction between fantasy and reality. And as long as parents or guardians are there to make those distinctions for their children, these media forms should not affect the development or psychological well-being of youth.

It is when children gain exposure to violent video games or TV in copious amounts without a proverbial voice of reason that the children's minds become a breeding ground for hostility, danger and aggression. When children can no longer separate the imaginary world of video games from their own surroundings the aggression they might harbor could evolve and manifest itself in violent behavior.

Parents truly are the gatekeepers who have the power to ensure video games, movies and television remain just that – entertainment. When these media forms become the means through which children develop belief systems and behavior patterns, and when this behavior goes unchecked, the actions of these youths may become extreme.

Parents have little to fear from violence in the media, as long as they are able and willing to communicate the real-life consequences of violence with their children.

Saying farewell Veteran editor reflects on life in Kedzie Hall

I stood in the doorway of Kedzie Hall with a suitcase in my hand and a confused look on my face. It was August 1997.

I was told that yes, this was the Collegian newsroom, and I was right on time for staff training. My parents had dropped me off, and I was to spend the weekend at the news editor's apartment until the residence halls opened for freshmen to move in for the fall semester. Looking around at all of the upperclassmen, who seemed so worldly, I was terrified and intimidated.

As the years passed, however, I racked up semester after semester of experience in collegiate journalism – reporting and writing, editing and designing, always being on the lookout for the news that shaped and defined our campus. That experience got me several internships and, after I graduated with my bachelor's degree, my first real-world job as a copy editor at a business newspaper in the Kansas City area.

Apparently, though, I wasn't finished with K-State, as I returned a year later to get my master's degree, which I received in December after two years of graduate work and a hefty thesis.

I recently realized that in a couple of weeks I will begin my new job at a newspaper in Nebraska and my tenure at the Collegian and the Royal Purple will truly be over. It is a relieving if not sobering thought, to say the least.

One of my favorite professors once mentioned to me that I have spent a third of my life in Kedzie Hall. It's a laughable statement but true nonetheless. I've never tired of hearing the "Corbin is so old" jokes that my Student Publications colleagues so regularly dole out – "Corbin is so old that he used to babysit the New Kids on the Block," "Corbin is so old that he copyedited the Declaration of Independence," and the like. I suppose I'll have to relinquish my title of "crustiest student journalist."

Student Publications has given me so much. I've made countless friends, colleagues and connections. Some of those friends have been there for me for years. Some of those friendships disintegrated. But I know I'll always have a family here.

Student Publications has taught me so much, as well. We've gone through pain in recent years but have emerged a stronger, more unified team when others thought we would fail. As the student-run newspaper and yearbook, we have told the rich stories of the people who make our campus great but cover tragedy, controversy and injustice with equal zeal.

That is the way of collegiate journalism – it is our voice, the voice of the students, and as long as our publications, our advisers and the university community encourage the basic tenets of freedom of speech, we will continue to serve you.

OK, I suppose this is the part that sounds like an Academy Award acceptance speech...

To my families at the Collegian and the Royal Purple, – and to Wanda, Jackie, Pat, Ann and Kim – I will miss all of you so much.

CORBIN H. CRABLE

To Ron – you've given me so much guidance, encouragement and knowledge. To Linda – I've always had and always will have the utmost respect for you. I would be so fortunate to have the smallest bit of your drive, passion and intelligence rub off on me during my professional career. Thank you for being my biggest advocate and for allowing me to be on your team.

All of you have prepared me for this next important step in my life. Student Publications and the people who work for it have given me some of the best experience and memories of my college years. The best way I can thank you for that is going out there, making my mark on professional journalism and adhering to the personal and professional ethics I have established for myself over the years.

See you on the flipside, Kedzie Hall. It's been a swell run.

Corbin really is leaving this time. Seriously. Please send your comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Celebrities exploited for entertainment value

It's amazing how disenchanted people can become with their own lives once they figure out how important everyone else's lives are.

They will do anything for money as long as it's at other people's loss of privacy and personal expense. The basis of our society and the morals we have held so dear are crumbling around us. However, this is bigger than curing AIDS or fighting poverty – this is about Brad and Angelina, Jessica and Nick, Britney and Kevin – all the perfect couples that have found controversy in the tabloids.

We have been concerned about these beautiful couples for a long time. We really want them to be happy, but oops, Britney did it again, marrying a random guy who has as much money as a liberal has authority in President Bush's cabinet.

However, since we know so much about Britney and Kevin's personal lives, we are clearly close personal friends of them, so we have a right to be alarmed at the recent state of affairs.

We called Britney on the phone, but she was too busy being a normal size (140 pounds – average for a woman her age and height) and eating normal food (instead of consuming only 1,200 calories a day like Lindsay Lohan – the bare minimum) to talk with us. Consequently, we will have to rely on a second cousin's brother-in-law who swears he saw a guy that sort of looks like Kevin kissing a stripper on New Year's eve in a dark nightclub in New Jersey.

It's all speculation at this point, but since the sources are clearly reliable, it's okay to assume it is true.

Since 'Kevney Spearsaline' hasn't gotten into any public fights lately, we should really talk about the two who certainly need our help to get to the truth – Jessica and Nick.

Oh my word, the hullabaloo surrounding those two is inconceivable.

Whom should we really believe? It is unfair of them to make us choose. We love them both.

On one hand, Jessica seems like a down-home girl, but then she firmed up to play a movie role, and it's obvious that must mean she also is cheating.

But what about Nick, who cheated on Jess with a random beautiful and intelligent college coed from Nebraska?

We must believe this girl – she does have a picture with him to serve as proof of their liaison.

However, we have to take into account the hundreds of other fans who probably have asked Nick for a picture.

He probably slept with all of them, too.

When it all comes down to it, if we weren't there, hanging around outside their house or spending the night just around the corner in our cars, waiting to see if they would like to talk with us (we're great listeners), then the world would just fall to pieces.

Where would all these celebrities be without us to exploit them for our own monetary gain?

Mayor addresses Parks and Rec investigations

By Owen Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At Tuesday's city commission meeting, Mayor Ed Klimek voiced commissioners' concern with the recent allegations of criminal activity within the Department of Parks and Recreation.

"We are very interested in making sure this is resolved," Klimek said. "We have two independent investigations regarding allegations of possible theft in our Parks and Rec department — also some gambling allegations, and now recently some pornography allegations."

Klimek said the alleged wrongdoings are a violation of public trust.

"As mayor, I take it very, very seriously when we have a misuse of public trust, and those that do misuse public trust and take advantage of situations that might be given to them need to be dealt with harshly and will be dealt with as such," he said. Klimek said the first investigation will be conducted by the Riley County Police Department and will investigate the allegations of criminal activity.

The second investigation will be conducted by the city, Klimek said.

"The city is conducting its own internal investigation and interviewing people, trying to get to the bottom of what the situation is at this time," he said.

Klimek said the city's investigation is being led by City Manager Ron Fehr and includes the city's management team.

Fehr said the city will work with the RCPD to conduct the internal investigation.

"These are very serious matters, and we will endeavor to resolve them to the fullest extent possible," Fehr said.

Klimek said the investigation is open to the public and the city does not want to hide anything from the people of Manhattan.

In other business, the commission approved an ordinance annexing/rezoning four tracts of land, totaling about 5.2 acres near Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community, 2121 Meadowlark Road.

The ordinance allows the land to be used for development and expansion of the retirement community.

Gale Urban, chief financial officer for Meadowlark Hills and project development coordinator, answered questions about the approved ordinance. She said the development will include building four new healthcare households, a retaining wall and a new road to parts of the area.

Klimek said he was pleased with the retirement community and the development plan.

"I did drive up by the whole project today, and boy — talk about a vibrant area," Klimek said. "There's lots going on. Lots of people living up there."

Dating Doctor offers advice

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

David Coleman, better known as "The Dating Doctor," gave relationship advice to students Tuesday night.

Coleman is a dating counselor who works one-on-one with people interested in improving their relationships. He said his work was the inspiration for a screenplay that later became the hit movie "Hitch." Coleman also has been featured in several magazines and newspapers, including USA Today.

Carol Kennedy, director of Health Education and Promotion at Lafene Health Center, assisted in bringing Coleman to K-State. She said she had seen Coleman speak before and thought his message was useful.

"I thought this was someone who could reach many different age groups and be funny," Kennedy said. "Having people see him and hear his message could be very helpful for anyone who's in a relationship or looking to get into one."

Coleman said his goal was to "raise everyone's relationship I.Q."

Coleman said he presented information students would find humorous, such as what he called "the 14 worst pick-up lines ever heard," as well as several stories of his personal experiences.

He spoke of items such as the stages of a relationship and characteristics of a healthy relationship. He also talked about what the opposite sex is thinking, how to handle break-ups, and how to handle oneself in various relationship situations.

Coleman challenged audience members to become what he called a "fat penguin," explaining that fat penguins "break the ice." He said a person should be confident in "breaking the ice," and be confident and courageous when seeking out a relationship.

While sharing his thoughts, Coleman offered the men several pieces of advice.

"The secret to a woman's heart is letting them know you're thinking about them when they're nowhere around," he said.

Coleman also discussed who is in control in a dating relationship and had information for the women of the audience.

He said the person who invests the least time and attention into a relationship is in control — this typically tends to be the male.

"The average woman invests more into a relationship than the average man," he said.

However, he said that is not always the case.

Coleman ended the evening with a question-and-answer session and suggested that people with questions about relationships should consult his Web site, www.datingdoctor.com.

The event's sponsors included SHAPE, Lafene Health Center, Student Governing Association, KSU Association of Residence Halls, and the Union Program Council.

Local middle-schoolers participate in engineering college egg drop

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Middle-schoolers from five local schools traveled to K-State Tuesday to participate in an egg drop sponsored by College of Engineering.

The competition, now in its second year, is sponsored by the National Society of Professional Engineers. NSPE president Nick Long said he thinks the competition is fun because the members get to watch younger kids.

"It's a blast," Long, sophomore in architectural engineering, said. "It's fun to watch them all, and it's a way to get engineering out there and support the college."

More than 100 students from Ottawa, Wamego, Dwight D. Eisenhower, Susan B. Anthony and Northern Hills middle schools participated.

The students are given a bag with materials, Long said.

Each team can use anything in the bag to build their contraption, which they dropped from the third story of Durland Hall.

Tom Roberts, assistant dean of the College of Engineering, said he likes the competition's influence on youths.

"I like watching our students learn," he said. "It teaches college kids how to run things, and I like to see the kids having fun."

Staci Gallagher, a parent who attended the event, said she believes it gets kids thinking scientifically.

"I think it's neat that the college puts this on," she said. "It really gets the kids thinking about engineering."

Gallagher said the finished product is impressive.

"It's interesting to see the way the kids have put it together," she said.

Dexter Walsh, seventh-grader from Wamego Middle School, said not all of the fun comes from the splatter.

"Although the splattering was cool, building the thing was the most fun," he said.

TO THE EDITOR

Collegian needs more letters to the editor

Editor,

I was wondering why there are fewer letters to the editor being printed this semester. Are there too many angry letters about some of the articles being printed? Does the Collegian no longer want to read the opinions of its readers are worth printing?

I have seen more letters to the editor in the local papers than I have in this semester's Collegian. I can't imagine that only one or two letters are sent during the week concerning articles. I find the opinions of some writers are not very informative; I doubt the accuracy of the information being "reported," and I am sure there have been many letters written. Last semester the Collegian had at least three or four letters two or three times a week. Why the change? When Justice for All, the group that brought in pictures of abortions, came to campus, there were letters every day in the paper. The paper this semester is beginning to get boring and uninformative on issues. Did all the good writers who could make you think a little graduate?

You have tons of advertising and little in the way of articles and reader opinion. This makes me wonder whether students think is more important than educating their minds and expanding their thought processes. I guess student thoughts don't go beyond food, sex, and liquor — if that is it, I say what a waste of a great opportunity to learn and better oneself.

Players need to make decisions

Make up your mind already.

Retire or don't retire.

Play for the Dominican Republic baseball team or the American team.

Compete in the Olympics, or pull out and let someone else take your figure-skating spot.

A trend has begun to arise in the world of sports — one that is as indecisive and unpredictable as women's basketball coach Deb Patterson's player rotation.

Athletes, all of a sudden, are turning into professional boxers who just keep fighting because they can't decide if it is the right time to retire or because they want to stay in the limelight a bit longer in anticipation of the big payday to come.

This past week, San Francisco Giant Barry Bonds was the latest to participate in this new trend.

He told MLB.com he would retire at the end of the 2006 season, regardless of whether he breaks Hank Aaron's home-run record. Hours after his first announcement, the player who is only seven home runs shy of passing Babe Ruth and 48 away from breaking Aaron's record, said he will play next year if his surgically-repaired knee is OK.

First off, there is no doubt Bonds is the most hated player in major league baseball by the fans, and possibly by his peers. There is no better judge of this than a recent ESPN.com online-poll that asked, "Do you want to see Bonds break Aaron's home run record?"

The answer — an astonishing 77 percent of the voters said they did not want the controversial slugger to pass up "Hammering Hank." He even lost the majority in his own state of California, which I'm sure was influenced by Los Angeles Dodgers fans, who take any chance they get to tear Bonds down.

He is not the only one who can't make up his mind, though.

New York Yankees third baseman Alex Rodriguez has been doing this throughout his career.

Recently, A-Rod finally decided to play for the U.S. team during the upcoming World

Coach tries to spread the word about roller hockey club

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State roller hockey coach Jerry Remsbecker wants to advertise, all he has to do is hop in his car and take a spin around the block.

"I own three different vehicles, and on the back of each of them it says, 'K-State hockey,'" said Remsbecker, computer information specialist for the College of Agriculture.

"When I drive around, people notice."

Remsbecker said many people are surprised to learn that K-State has a roller hockey club. He called his team "the best-kept secret on campus" and said his goal is to get the secret out.

Bringing roller hockey to the masses might sound like a daunting task, but Remsbecker doesn't have to do it alone. His wife, Colette, has been instrumental in helping him build the K-State program, he said.

"My wife is the world's biggest hockey fan," Remsbecker said. "She'll come up after the game and talk to the guys, tell them what they did right and wrong. They listen to her, because she's right."

Some of Colette Remsbecker's contributions include sewing Powercat logos on the team's jerseys, keeping stats for her husband and rooting for the team from the stands. She said the latter is one of her most important duties.

"I'm one of the team's biggest cheerleaders," she said. "When we play in St. Louis, we'll usually have three or four fans there. I think it's important for the team to have that support and incentive."

Colette even joined her husband on the bench for a game earlier this season as an assistant coach. She said coaching gave her a new perspective on hockey.

"When you're a fan, it's easy to say 'Why didn't he get the puck?'" she said. "You don't realize how hard they play and the toll it takes on them. (Coaching) is a very different perspective."

Colette said she enjoyed the experience, but found some aspects of coaching difficult.

"I had trouble keeping my mouth shut," she said. "Jerry had to tell me to be quiet because the ref almost gave us a penalty. It was tough."

The Remsbeckers have always been passionate about hockey, but Jerry said he had no intention of coaching when he came to K-State. He said the opportunity came about purely by chance.

"I was walking on campus and I saw a bunch of guys practicing (roller hockey) in the tennis courts by Goodnow (Hall)," he said.

"I said, 'Hey, can I play with you guys?' They said, 'Sure.'"

Soon after, Jerry took over as faculty adviser and coach for the roller hockey club. In six seasons at K-State, he has enjoyed the highs (a final-four berth in the 2001 national championship tournament) and endured the lows (a two-year winless drought, snapped earlier this season). But through it all, Jerry has never stopped believing in his team.

"Jerry wants them to never give up and always strive to be the best," Colette said. "He wants them to believe they always have a chance to win."

Case in point: K-State (1-17) will face undefeated Missouri-St. Louis in the opening round of the regional playoffs March 4. If Jerry is intimidated, he certainly doesn't show it.

"We're a long shot, but that's OK," Remsbecker said. "I feel we have them right where we want them."

Even if K-State can't pull off the upset, he said he is optimistic about the team's future. Many of the players on this year's squad will be returning next season, and he said he hopes to bring in a few new recruits. He said he also hopes to have a new practice facility within the next few years.

"I'd love to see a real facility somewhere in the area, preferably on campus," Remsbecker said.

"That would be the biggest thing that could make this program grow."

The club practices at a roller rink in Junction City, Kan. Jerry said the team can only practice one night a week because of financial constraints associated with renting the rink.

Jerry said he plans to propose a new on-campus practice facility to student senate. The proposed facility would provide practice space for hockey, gymnastics and other sports.

"I think (the facility) would be phenomenal," Jerry said. "It opens up an arena for sports that people are interested in, but there are no venues for."

Until a new facility is built, Jerry said he plans to continue practicing in Junction City. He said practices are open to any K-State student, regardless of skill level or sex.

Jenette Turpin, graduate student in early childhood education, is one of two women on the K-State roller hockey team. Turpin, who grew up playing roller hockey with her brother, said K-State is one of the only schools in the area that gives women the opportunity to play.

Turpin said she is grateful to Remsbecker for giving her the opportunity to compete and supporting her along the way.

"He is willing to help anyone improve," Turpin said. "He makes us work very hard, but also understands that having fun is important. We talk to him all the time — he's always willing to talk to us."

Remsbecker said working with the players — both male and female — is one of the reasons he loves his job.

"Hockey is the best thing that ever happened to me at K-State," Remsbecker said. "(Coaching hockey) is the best part about what I do here."

TRK | Lancaster named Big 12 Athlete of Week

K-State senior high jumper Kyle Lancaster earned his second career indoor Big 12 Athlete of the Week citation on Tuesday afternoon for his performance during the KSU Open Feb. 18. It is the third Big 12 designation for the Wildcats in 2006.

Lancaster won the men's high jump with a school record-tying height of 7-5 1/4. The clearance ties a 13-year-old record set by Percell Gaskins during the 1993 NCAA Indoor Championships. The height by the Fort Scott, Kan., product did break the KSU Open meet record of 7-4 1/2, previously held by Nathan Leeper from the 2002 meet.

Lancaster enters this weekend's Big 12 Indoor Track and Field Championships ranked second in the nation, and has won five titles this season.

Cats look to improve after loss at opener

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The outcome of the women's golf spring opener is not a sign of K-State's potential, Coach Kristi Knight said.

The Wildcats placed 13th in a 14-team field in Monday and Tuesday's Central District Invitational in Parrish, Fla., but Knight said the Cats are close to being good.

"We're not far from playing good golf," she said. "It's the first tournament of the spring — we expected mistakes and loss of focus. They weren't as sharp as they could be, but the good news is I know they can score better, and they know they can score better."

Baylor took first with a total of 896, and K-State combined for a 73-over par 937 for all three rounds.

Individually, sophomore Kali Quick tied for 11th place with a 10-over par 226, junior Katy Heffel and Helene Robert tied for 51st with a 21-over par 237 and sophomore Hailey Mireles tied for 57th with a 23-over par 239.

"There's a lot of good there, we've just got to be more consistent and we're not that far away."

This tournament was the first for true freshman Krista Nelson, who placed 66th with a 27-over par 243, and she had a lot to deal with in her first tournament, Knight said.

"I was proud of Krista for being a walk-on true freshman and in the lineup for her first-ever college tournament," she said. "She's not happy with her score, but she knows she can do it, and she felt every day she could do it. She turned a negative experience into a positive one and got some good experience out of it."

Overall, Knight said the attitudes of the golfers remained high, but there are several things the team is going to work on leading up to the next for wireless Internet necessary

Wireless Internet access is everywhere, and a majority of people have used it, including myself.

I use it on campus almost on a daily basis. It is convenient, easy, fast and reliable. I guess I am the Wi-Fi advocate.

If you have any kind of a device with wireless connections — whether it be a PDA, laptop, Sony PSP, Nintendo DS, smartphone, etc. — get the wireless access code to use it on campus.

The wireless Internet is available in a lot of places throughout campus, including Hale, the K-State Student Union and 31 other buildings.

There is a bit of work involved to get set up on the wireless network. The easiest method is to hop onto any Internet-enabled computer and browse to <http://www.k-state.edu/cns/networks/wireless>.

From there you can see the wireless locations, and also go to the wireless setup link. Then click on the K-State WEP setting to find out the WEP key.

It requires an eID and password before giving the key. The WEP is like a password to get access to the network.

They do this to prevent any bum from strolling in and stealing Internet access.

And yes, I guess I could be considered one of these bums. They are everywhere, and especially in highly populated apartment complexes, you can see a lot of wireless networks available at any given time.

There are eight wireless networks accessible from my own apartment complex. And what is even more astonishing, four of those networks are unprotected, meaning that I can connect to other people's wireless networks just by clicking a button and then proceeding to do whatever I want on the Internet.

Secure your wireless Internet, period.

Here are some risks if you don't.

People can download illegal software from your connection.

Having an open wireless connection also could compromise the security and well-being of computer(s) that are on your network.

Malware, short for malicious software, are types of software that do harm such as viruses, spyware and worms. Malware is becoming so advanced that it can easily travel throughout networks, wreaking havoc on every computer attached.

Both of these situations can be easily prevented by securing your network.

Don't know how to secure your network?

It might not be entirely easy, but there are many resources out there to help. First, read the manual (given that you didn't throw it out). All wireless routers are different, and the manual is the fool-proof way of making sure your router and network are secure.

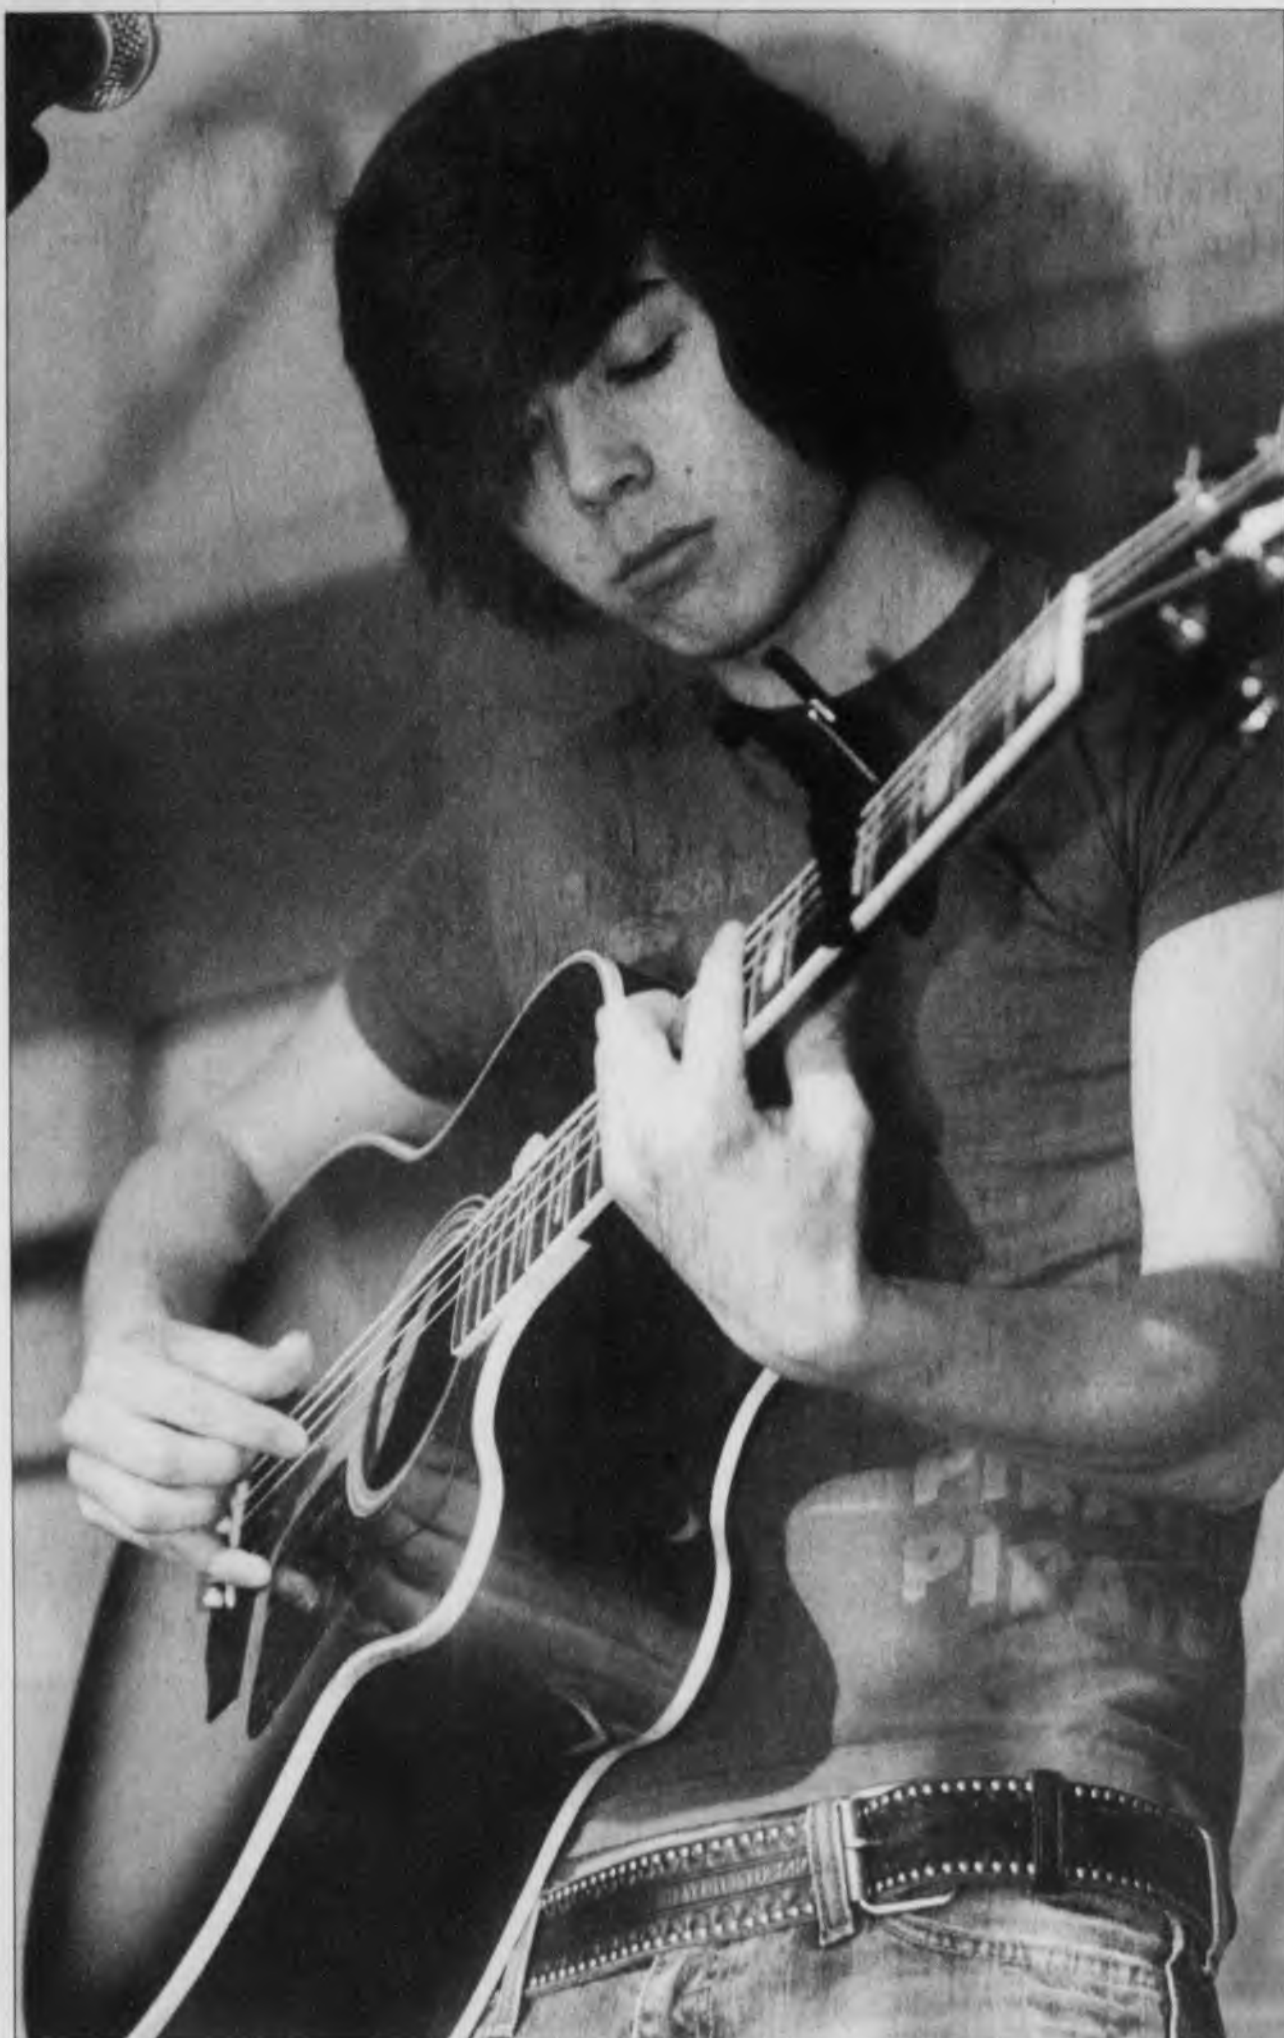

If this doesn't work, pick up the phone. Every wireless router manufacturer out there has a help line. And in most cases a simple Google search can retrieve the number.

If you are one of those many people out there "borrowing" wireless Internet from your unknowing neighbors, I apologize for possibly ruining your free hook-ups.

But then again, you shouldn't be a thieving bum to begin with.

The show went on for the Union Program Council's Tuesday Night Buzz despite a last-minute cancellation by Wayne Goins, professor of music, who was scheduled to play a jazz set.

Chad Hodge, solo artist and freshman in mass communications, was the first of two performers to take the stage Tuesday night.

Because of the last-minute notice, Hodge said he had to quickly put some things together for his act.

"I just kind of threw it all together," Hodge said. "I thought it went pretty well. The crowd was really nice."

UPC arts committee co-chair Kurt Fenster said the turnout for Tuesday Night Buzz usually is good, but it depends on the entertainment.

"We usually get a moderate to good turnout. Tonight there is a really good crowd," Fenster said.

The second act of the night was Less Than Three, also a solo guitar act. Both Hodge and Less Than Three attracted a wide audience, some of whom have heard their music before.

"I thought they were really good. It was even better because I knew them. Hopefully, I can come out on Tuesday nights more often," said Glenn Davis, freshman in youth ministry at Manhattan Christian College.

Adrienne Ralston, junior in fine arts,

Less Than Three solo guitarist Jimmy Baker, Manhattan resident, performs one of his songs at Tuesday Night Buzz as the second of two acts that replaced Wayne Goins after his last-minute cancellation.

said she also is a friend of the performers. She said she was glad to see UPC support local talent.

"I definitely thought they were good. It was cool that UPC was supporting students, and I was glad to see the crowd came out like they did," Ralston said.

While some students went to support their friends, others attended the event to take a break from studying.

"I came here to sketch, so it was nice to have something laid back to listen to. He (Hodge) had a really nice voice," Anna Lampe, junior in interior architecture, said.

UPC provided complimentary drinks and snacks to help attract audience members and help them enjoy their experience. They also handed out free pens and keychains, and drew a winner for a free T-shirt at the end of the night.

"We try to come as often as we can. The free coffee and food is also a good way to take a break and chill out," Amy Wright, sophomore in interior architecture, said.

Fenster also said while UPC tries to bring in local talent, they also try to diversify their performances.

"We try to (include) many different types of music. Singer/songwriters are the people that we try to bring in the most. We are trying to bring in a more diverse range of acts though," Fenster said.

The UPC will feature a variety of performers in the coming weeks, beginning March 28 with a performance from the Benders. Following that there will be an appearance by John Rush, and in April there will be a poetry slam along with a student comedy competition.

DAILY
HOROSCOPES

Aries

(March 21 - April 19)

You'll become part of the Formal Attire Resurgence movement. Be wary of the Casualist Party though — there's someone out there just dying to spit on your spats.

Taurus

(April 20 - May 20)

You are sad about an upcoming event, but can do nothing about it. Try knitting — people say it's wonderfully relaxing.

Gemini

(May 21 - June 20)

Time to commit some random acts of kindness. The next time someone asks you for a quarter (or any small coin), take one out of your pocket, and toss it in the air. Heads, give it to them. Tails, put it back in your pocket, and tell them you haven't got any. Remember, the important thing is to be RANDOM.

Cancer

(June 21 - July 22)

Bring extra. You'll need it.

Leo

(July 23 - August 22)

You will discover the secret to becoming a great artist! You can stick anything you want on the wall, the trick is to make people think deep thought went into it. For example, spray-paint a bathroom plunger gold, and stick little angel wings on it. Call it "Life In The Details."

Virgo

(August 23 - September 22)

You will discover a large black obelisk out on the lawn today, which obviously weighs several tons. You will be amazed at the effort some people put into a practical joke.

Libra

(September 22 - October 22)

You will have more psychotronic energy today than usual. I recommend that you direct it towards the fridge. There's something alive in there.

Scorpio

(October 23 - November 21)

That new employee seems honest, and is a really hard worker — so who cares if she wants to wear a studded dog collar? You'll have to draw the line at butt sniffing, though.

Sagittarius

(November 22 - December 21)

You will feel tired and run-down today. This may possibly be because of the marathon you ran yesterday, and the car that ran into you near the finish line. Just a guess.

Capricorn

(December 22 - January 20)

A coworker is going to steal one of your best ideas and claim it as his own. That's about what you should expect, though, from a cow "orker."

Aquarius

(January 21 - February 18)

Today you will realize that it's impossible to truly "control" anything, even yourself, and that the best you can hope for is to have some "influence" over yourself and your surroundings.

Pisces

(February 19 - March 20)

Soon you will find something that is almost, but not quite, the cat's pajamas. More like the cat's jock strap, in this case.

president have done a great job of setting it up," Hauser said. "Now it is up to the next administration to implement it."

PARKING GARAGE

The Kansas Board of Regents has given approval for K-State to build a parking garage. Candidates were asked what else they would do to alleviate the lack of parking at K-State.

Gigstad said he thinks there should be a shuttle service implemented in addition to the parking garage.

Boldt said she supports the parking garage and also is looking at the shuttle system option. It would ensure students are able to get to campus even during construction of the parking garage, she said.

"We're looking for new ways to make sure students can get where they're going safely," Boldt said.

Wallisch said he thinks there is no reason to speak out against the parking garage since it has been approved.

"It is a good idea," Wallisch said. "I just hope they start to build it when traffic on campus is decreased."

Hoffman said she wants to build a stronger relationship with Faculty Senate. This would ensure an understanding of Student Senate's intentions when voting on issues such as the parking garage, she said.

"The parking garage is great for the university, and I will support what Student Senate does as far as that goes," Hoffman said.

King said there is a wait right now for the next census to determine how much federal funding Manhattan and K-State would receive for a citywide shuttle system.

"(We) need to work more closely with city commissioners and community leaders as well as the administration to integrate this system into the city," King said.

Collett said a shuttle system at Passersby in the K-State Student Union pause to listen to the eight candidates for student body president sound off on a range of topics during a panel discussion Tuesday afternoon. The primary elections will take place Feb. 28 and March 1.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

K-State with 10- or 15-passenger vans would benefit the university and give students additional jobs. The shuttle system also could help with SafeRide at night, Collett said.

Maddy said the university already has spoken on the issue of the parking garage. The addition of a permanent, non-voting seat on city commission for the student body president would help in addressing the parking issue, Maddy said.

Hauser said Manhattan's population will surpass 50,000 in the next census, which would ensure federal funding for a citywide transportation system. This will happen in about four or five years, Hauser said.

HOUSING

With the growing population of Fort Riley in mind, candidates were asked to address how they would handle Manhattan's housing issue.

Gigstad said the university should offer help with housing for incoming students.

"(We need to) continue to do the things we already have to help them look for places to live, and evaluate former tenants," Gigstad said.

Boldt said Jardine Apartments' renovations are an example of what K-State is doing to improve the housing situation.

"We want to make sure that people are coming home and have some places where they can conveniently live near campus," Boldt said.

Wallisch said student government does not have control over the housing issue.

"It's something we're going to have to communicate with the city commission and let them know we need more housing, so maybe they can open up more housing," Wallisch said.

Hoffman said additional promotion of the residence halls and getting wireless Internet connection in the residence halls is one solution.

"Why not push our residence hall systems a little more and keep kids on campus and at the same time, build organization and campus involvement?" Hoffman said.

King said Consumer and Tenant Affairs in the Office of Student Activities and Services already collects information on rental housing, but the service is not comprehensive.

"We can do better to improve the services that we give students," King said. "(We need to continue) working with the community members, and continue to cultivate relationships with city commission members to get a rental registration list to let students know where they can live."

the DNA test," Yoder said.

One of the arguments against the harsher punishment could deal with the issue of privacy, Horst said.

"I would suspect there would be individuals who would see that as an invasion of privacy," Horst said. "But you have to think, who's privacy are you looking out for?"

Rep. Bill Otto (R-LeRoy) said it is difficult to charge a criminal with a felony just for refusing to submit.

"It's pretty hard to make it a felony to refuse," said Otto, co-signer of the bill. "And even if you are a criminal, you still have rights."

Otto said the bill could be beneficial for those submitting the samples.

"In future cases of rapes, you can be very confident that the person you are convicting is the person who did the crime," Otto said. "And that is something we should all be hoping to accomplish. It is important to have a system of justice."

INDECISION | Mixed signals can taint careers

Baseball Classic, spurning the Dominican team he first said he would play for.

This all came after Rodriguez said he would not play in the WBC at all. He is on his way to becoming one of the best all-around players in Major League Baseball, but his indecisive behavior will follow him throughout his career, the same way steroid use is clouding Bonds.

When Rodriguez was the first pick in the amateur draft, he did not want to play for the Seattle Mariners, but then changed his mind. After that, he wanted to play for a contender, but instead, he left a better team in Seattle and took more than $200 million from the Texas Rangers for the right to be buried in last place.

His most public switch was when he accepted the trade to the Yankees, after the Boston Red Sox had already bargained with him to bring him to Fenway Park. The reason he did not go to Boston — he did not want to play another position other than shortstop.

So, he went to New York and is playing third base.

Last week, Michelle Kwan decided to withdraw from the Olympics due to injury, and Emily Hughes took her spot.

Kwan, 26 — the equivalent to a 38-year-old football player — missed the U.S. Championships because of a groin injury. Even though this is the platform for people to participate in the Olympics, she won her spot.

She went back-and-forth for a week whether she would be able to compete, finally giving up on her chance to win a gold medal. The right decision, because she did not deserve to be in Torino, Italy.

I'm sure Jerome Bettis would be included in this conversation, but winning a Super Bowl is a great way to go out.

Just ask Michael Jordan. There is not a better way to go out than as a champion, making the game-winning shot.

Wait, never mind — he couldn't make up his mind, either.

Wildcats drop 3rd straight; OU still perfect in conference

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Oklahoma continued its domination of the Big 12 Conference with a 78-64 win against K-State on Tuesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

Led by freshman Courtney Paris, who registered her 20th consecutive double-double with 22 points and 15 rebounds. The No. 9 Sooners (24-4, 14-0) tied the team's longest in-season league winning streak of 14 games. The loss gave the Wildcats their first three-game conference losing streak since the 2000-01 season.

Despite the Sooners' 14-point margin of victory, the Wildcats (17-8, 7-7) had Oklahoma on the ropes after erasing an 18-4 lead early in the first half with a 16-4 run to tie the game at 20-20 with 7:59 remaining.

"I think we competed extremely well and made it a basketball game and just dealt with the personality that it (the game) took on early in the half," Coach Deb Patterson said. "I felt great about how our team fought back in the first half."

After tying the game, K-State would go up by as many as four with three minutes left in the first half behind the shooting of junior Twiggy McIntyre.

The Sapulpa, Okla., native scored eight of her team-high 15 points during the final seven minutes of the first half.

The Wildcat defense also was able to keep Paris, a seven-time Big 12 Rookie of the Week, to just 6-of-11 shooting in the first half.

"Kansas State did a good job, they really played hard, you could tell they were playing with a sense of urgency, and they did a great job covering down on Courtney (Paris)," Oklahoma coach Sherri Coale said.

The second half began much like the first, with the Sooners going on a 14-2 run in the opening minutes to build a 50-41 lead with 16:33 remaining.

"I think the difference of the second half was we didn't finish shots," Patterson said. "We just couldn't get the shots to go down that were going down in the first half."

Although K-State started the second half cold, the Wildcats clawed back with a 9-0 run to tie the game at 50-50 with 13:43 left in the game behind junior Claire Coggins' scoring seven points in three minutes.

"The opportunity presented itself, and I was able to hit the shots," said Coggins, who finished with 13 points. "Our whole team fought really hard to come back after that run and I'm glad I was able to help."

Coale said she was impressed with the way K-State fought back in the second half.

"They shoot it (the ball) very well, and we kept turning it over and giving them extra possessions and a hungry team is going to capitalize on that and they did," Coale said.

After the Wildcats tied the game, Oklahoma junior Kendra Moore exploded for 13 points in the final nine minutes of the game, and the Sooners hit 9-of-10 of from the free-throw line down the stretch to keep their bid of becoming the first team ever to go undefeated in conference play alive.

Patterson said despite her team dropping to a .500 record in conference play, she was pleased with her team's effort against the Big 12 regular-season champion Sooners.

"I was really proud of our team," Patterson said. "I think tonight we demonstrated we can be a very good basketball team."

Oklahoma's Paris scores 22 points in win, records 20th straight double-double

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Entering Tuesday's game against Oklahoma, both Sooners and K-State Wildcat fans expected to see the next installment of the Courtney Paris show.

Averaging 20 points and 15.3 rebounds per Big 12 Conference game, Paris entered Tuesday's contest searching for her 20th-straight double-double and her 25th double-double on the season.

Paris succeeded by scoring 22 points and snagging 15 rebounds. She maintained pace with her double-double average, despite intense pressure from the Wildcat defense.

"I think towards the second half of the season, teams have gotten a lot more physical, and they did a good job," Paris said of the K-State defense. "I think that is a good strategy, and it was definitely a lot more physical."

Oklahoma opened the game by taking an 18-4 lead in just more than six minutes. However, K-State managed their first comeback of the night and went into the locker room with a three-point lead at the half.

In the first half, Paris scored 12 of her points.

She could have been more damaging, though, hitting only 6-of-11 from the field and missing all six of her first-half free throws.

"They did a great job covering down low on Courtney," Oklahoma coach Sherri Coale said. "We jumped out to a quick lead and then just kind of went away for awhile. We kind of became observers instead of players."

Freshman forward Marlies Gipson said she played against Paris when they both were younger, and said Paris is still an amazing player.

"Going into the game, I was trying not to be intimidated, but I think in the post, Danielle (Zanotti) coming in, she did awesome on defense," Gipson said. "Then Jessica (McFarland) and JoAnn (Hamlin) — they did awesome jobs on somewhat trying to contain her. I think it's just a team effort on her tonight."

Defending Paris' 6-foot-4-inch frame in the paint has proven difficult for every team in the Big 12 this season. Coach Deb Patterson said using bench play and rotating players helped keep Oklahoma from becoming accustomed to any one player.

"We just wanted to vary our looks defensively, particularly in the post," Patterson said. "Courtney probably played to her average, but I think we made it a challenge for her."

Sophomore guard Clent Stewart looks for an open player in K-State's game against Colorado on Saturday. Because of an aggravated ankle, Stewart is questionable to start in tonight's game against Texas.

Foot injury keeps Stewart questionable for tonight's game

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State fans might witness an unfamiliar sight when the Wildcats face No. 7 Texas tonight – a starting lineup without sophomore Clent Stewart.

Stewart has been a fixture at point guard since he arrived on campus, starting 49 of 52 games throughout the last two seasons.

However, Stewart said a foot injury might keep him out of tonight's starting lineup.

"(Starting) is really up in the air," Stewart said. "For me personally, it's not a big deal to start or not start. I just want to play and win."

Stewart said he does not expect the injury to keep him off the court, even if he does not start the game.

"I am expecting to play," Stewart said. "I'm not sure (about the nature of the injury). I think it is just the tissue. We are getting it figured out, and I should be fine by (today)."

Stewart, who leads K-State with 80 assists, said he injured his right foot in the second half of K-State's 72-60 win against Colorado on Saturday.

"In the second half, I came out and didn't go back in," Stewart said. "Coach called a timeout because I told him to take me out."

"I was trying to push off my foot, and something down there just didn't feel right."

Coach Jim Wooldridge said Stewart has battled nagging injuries for much of the season and said he expects Stewart to play despite the sore foot.

"(Stewart's) had a few other little knicks and knacks, but nothing serious enough to keep him out," Wooldridge said. "We hope he can go – we think he can go. But we are just going to have to go day-to-day with him."

If Stewart is unable to start tonight, junior Mario Taybron is a candidate to take his place in the starting lineup. Taybron hit 3-of-4 field goals in Saturday's win against Colorado, including a breakaway dunk and a 3-pointer that fueled K-State's second half.

"(Taybron) came in last week and did a tremendous job running the team," Stewart said. "It's great to have that one-two punch from the point guard position."

Taybron, who started six games as a true freshman at Temple, averages 4.3 points and 2.3 assists per game for the Wildcats this season.

Stewart said he and Taybron have a healthy rivalry on the court and a friendly relationship off it.

"(Taybron) lives right above Akeem (Wright), Curtis (Allen) and me," Stewart said. "We all hang out and have a good time."

"Obviously, it's competitive on the court, but we're cool everywhere else."

Cats look to upset Texas again

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before the K-State men's basketball team upset Kansas in Lawrence, Kan., earlier this season, senior forward Dramane Diarra's favorite Wildcat memory involved a matchup against then-No. 10 Texas on March 6, 2004.

In front of a nationally televised audience, K-State defeated the Longhorns 58-48 at Bramlage Coliseum, causing President Jon Wefald and other fans to rush the court.

"We were jumping up and down," Diarra said. "It was a great feeling, but I kind of forgot about it. We have to make it happen again so I can remember what it felt like."

Diarra's wish might come true if K-State (14-9, 5-7) is able to defeat No. 7 Texas (22-4, 10-2) tonight at Bramlage.

Diarra said he thinks anything is possible, especially after learning of Oklahoma State's 81-60 win against Texas on Sunday in Stillwater, Okla.

"To me, every team in the Big 12 is beatable on any given night," Diarra said.

Sunday's loss dropped Texas into a tie with Kansas for first place in the Big 12 Conference, while K-State sits in sole possession of sixth.

"(Texas) will come in very hungry and very angry," Diarra said. "They don't want to go on a losing streak, but hey, we just have to play harder than them."

Texas, which was ranked No. 2 in the Associated Press preseason poll, leads the Big 12 in four statistical categories – scoring defense, scoring margin, 3-point field-goal percentage and 3-point field-goal percentage defense.

Three Longhorns average more than 14 points per game – junior forward PJ Tucker, sophomore forward LaMarcus Aldridge and sophomore guard Daniel Gibson.

Aldridge and Tucker also are No. 1 and No. 2 in the conference in rebounds, averaging 9.3 and 9.1 per game, respectively.

"Those group of guys together – and throw (Brad) Buckman in there too – they have a tough lineup," junior forward Cartier Martin said. "They are all productive and have done great things to help their team. But it is a team sport, and it is going to take more than just those three guys to beat our team."

Martin, the Big 12's fourth-leading scorer at 18.7 points per game, led K-State with 21 points and 10 rebounds in its 72-60 win against Colorado on Wednesday.

A Houston native, Martin said he was recruited by Texas but decided on K-State for a number of reasons.

"Texas was one of my top five choices, but I just kind of wanted to get out of the state," Martin said. "Plus, I felt comfortable when I came here (to Manhattan) on my visit."

"Texas basketball wasn't really that big when I was growing up in Texas. It was more of a football school, but now it has developed into both. They have a good group of guys, but I like K-State. I'm a K-Stater."

Martin and Diarra were two of four current Wildcats who saw playing time when K-State upset Texas two years ago, along with junior guard Lance Harris and junior forward Tyler Hughes.

Last season, Texas defeated K-State 75-72 in overtime Feb. 12 in Austin, Texas.

Sophomore guard Clent Stewart, who grew up playing AAU basketball against Texas' Gibson, said the loss was disappointing since the Wildcats could have won.

"Last year in the overtime game against them, we had every opportunity to win but didn't get the outcome we wanted," said Stewart, who suffered a foot injury Saturday against Colorado, forcing him to the sideline for the last 8 minutes of play.

After viewing film on Texas, Wooldridge said he was impressed by the Longhorns' offensive balance and rebounding ability.

"If you look at their statistics, they have four or five guys who can score in double figures," Wooldridge said.

"They play out of a lot of pick and rolls, and they play out of the post. To get them in the half court, that is how you have to stop them – play good pick-and-roll defense and post defense."

Texas Longhorns' fearsome foursome

LaMarcus Aldridge

Aldridge, a sophomore forward, has established himself as one of the most dominant forwards in the Big 12. He is averaging 15.9 points per game (No. 9 Big 12), is shooting 59.3 percent from the floor (No. 1 Big 12), is pulling down 9.3 rebounds per game (No. 1 Big 12) and is blocking 1.96 shots per game (No. 2 Big 12). He was named to the 30-player Wooden Award Midseason All-America team on Jan. 30 and was awarded the Phillips 66 Big 12 Conference Player of the Week Nov. 28. Cartier Martin on Aldridge... "I like Aldridge. I like his game. He is a long guy in there. He can block shots. He can rebound the ball well. He is a young guy, so he has a lot of time to step up and do some big things."

Brad Buckman

Brad Buckman, a senior forward, brings a strong defensive presence to the court. He is averaging 7.0 rebounds per game (No. 8 Big 12), is shooting 75.9 percent from the line (No. 7 Big 12) and is blocking 1.73 shots per game (No. 4 Big 12).

Daniel Gibson

Gibson, a sophomore guard, is one of the best point guards in the conference. He is contributing 14.2 ppg (No. 13 Big 12), is connecting on 2.81 3-pointers per game (No. 3 Big 12) and is shooting 37.4 percent from behind the three-point arc (No. 7 Big 12). Gibson was dubbed the National Player of the Week by Dick Vitale on Jan. 23 — the same week he was awarded the Phillips 66 Big 12 Conference Player of the Week. He also was named 1-of-16 finalists for the Bob Cousy Award on Feb. 2. Clint Stewart on Gibson... "He is a good point guard. I played against him growing up in AAU ball. He is a good shooter if he gets going, and he can handle the ball as well."

P.J. Tucker

Tucker, a junior post, is considered to be a threat in nearly every aspect of his game. He is averaging 16.4 ppg (No. 7 Big 12), 9.1 boards per game (No. 2 Big 12), is firing 53.9 percent from the floor (No. 5 Big 12), is shooting 75.4 percent from the free-throw line (No. 8 Big 12) and is notching 1.85 steals per game (No. 6 Big 12). He was named Phillips 66 Big 12 Conference Player of the Week Dec. 5, Jan. 2 and Jan. 9. Tucker also joined Aldridge on the 30-player Wooden Award Midseason All-America team.

Big 12's basketball circus — starring Snyder, Sutton, Knight

I'm not exactly sure when the coaches in the Big 12 Conference started behaving like stars in a three-ring circus.

The antics of coaches throughout the Midwest certainly have made the roller coaster that is Big 12 basketball more interesting, but lately, it seems like ESPN has turned into a televised version of the National Enquirer.

Enter the stars of ESPN-turned-National Enquirer — Oklahoma State coach Eddie Sutton, Texas Tech coach Bobby Knight and — surprise, surprise — former Missouri coach Quin Snyder.

It seems the chaos started about two weeks ago, with Snyder's announcement that he was going to resign. It wasn't his resignation that came as a surprise to most — it was bound to come sooner or later, considering the Tigers' disappointing season.

The shocking element was the fact that the day before,

Snyder told the media he had not even thought about resigning. Less than 24 hours later, he stepped down.

Immediately, the gossip began circulating. Why was he resigning? Was it his decision or was he forced? Was it because his coaching tenure at Mizzou is synonymous with controversy, fraud and lies?

Well, once again, Athletic Director Mike Alden, President Elson Floyd and Snyder didn't disappoint. The game of "he said, she said" began almost instantaneously.

Snyder accused Alden of forcing him to step down and attached a weird twist, claiming that Alden sent Gary Link, a Missouri radio announcer, to deliver an ultimatum. Alden refuted Snyder's comments and Missouri launched another so-called "investigation," which (gasp) came up inconclusive, and the negative attention that, once again, was drawn to Columbia, Mo., was a result of "poor communication," Missouri Chancellor Brady Deaton said.

Then, on Monday, additional news surfaced. Alden admitted in his weekly radio spot, "The Mike Alden Show," that Link was an intricate piece to the Snyder-resignation puzzle. According to an article in The Kansas City Star on Tuesday, he reversed his previous statement that he only sent Link to see how Snyder was doing after the Baylor loss (he must have had a temporary memory lapse) and instead said that he did, in fact, send Link to talk to Snyder and "... see if this (coaching) is something he wants to continue to do. Does he want to keep coaching? Or does he think that he might want to step away?"

So, Link is the guinea pig. Geez, Missouri makes it too easy.

But let's move on. There's more to chat about.

Eddie Sutton, the heart and soul of Oklahoma State and a living legend in Stillwater, Okla., was charged with "aggravated driving under the influence of alcohol" on Feb. 18. This came about a week after Sutton was pulled over Feb. 10 in Stillwater — on his way to the airport to catch a flight with his team to travel to Lubbock, Texas, for its game against Texas A&M — when his sports utility vehicle swerved through four lanes of traffic, ran into another car, and crashed into a tree.

Tests revealed that 69-year-old Sutton had a blood-alcohol content of .22, nearly three times the legal limit in Oklahoma, according to an affidavit filed with the charge.

Sure, Sutton took a medical leave of absence Feb. 14, stating in a release he almost took a leave for chronic back pain after the game against K-State on Feb. 4, and now, with his DUI, knows he is doing the right thing.

But is that really how a coach who was six wins short of an 800-victory tenure wanted to end his coaching career? To get sauced on a Sunday before hopping a flight with his team?

I mean, this is more embarrassing to Oklahoma State than Iowa State dealing with former basketball coach Larry Eustachy partying with college students and kissing coeds after a Cyclone loss in Missouri.

You know, it's one thing to indulge in a few drinks, maybe even cross the line and get a little hooty. But it's another to mix drinking and your job, like Sutton did.

That's tough — what will be better conversation at the water cooler: Missouri's lies or Sutton's DUI? Is it ironic that Sutton was pulled over on his way to catch a flight to Lubbock to have a coach off against the next circus member, Bobby Knight?

Well, it seemed Sutton getting a DUI was really the icing on the cake, but when I found out Bobby Knight was joining the reality TV world, with the likes of MTV pre-teens, Hulk Hogan and Flava Flav, I checked my backside to make sure monkeys weren't flying out of my butt.

Knight — who has been coaching college basketball for 43 years, has three national championship titles and an Olympic gold medal — debuted in his show, "Knight School," in which he picks one player to fill a walk-on position for his team, on Feb. 19.

Now, this is something we would expect of Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski, who can be seen on television advertising American Express cards more often than on the basketball court.

But Bobby Knight, the coach who made a raging temper tolerable in college basketball? Could this be Knight's attempt at clearing his name and/or making a national comeback?

Maybe fans will start attending basketball games in Lubbock, Texas, now that they have a TV star coaching on the sidelines.

If I was talking, not writing, my mouth would be exhausted.

Tonight, we get to take a break from the circus and watch K-State and Texas square off — a contest boasting two coaches who have refrained from lying, are DUI-free, and have not joined the reality race.

K-State basketball has had its fair share of ups and downs this season. Nobody can predict if the Cats are going to win or lose, and they haven't always lived up to season expectations.

At the same time, at least Coach Jim Woodriddle isn't bringing unnecessary, negative media attention to Manhattan.

Thanks, Coach Woodriddle, for staying out of the three-ring circus.

Off The Court with Danielle Zanotti

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The name Zanotti might make people think of shoes or handbags, but freshman Danielle Zanotti is making a name for herself at K-State.

The Yukon, Okla., native has seen an increase in playing time for the Wildcats and sat down with the Collegian before K-State's game against Oklahoma on Tuesday to talk about her love of fashion, Facebook.com and her mother's vicious elbows.

Q: What's your favorite place to shop?

A: Well, unfortunately, here in Manhattan, we don't have a great mall compared to Oklahoma City, but here it would probably be Hollister. It's kind of more my style, since I'm into surfing, which is weird, because I'm from Oklahoma.

Q: Who is tougher – Shalee Lehnig or a crash test dummy?

A: I'm going to go with Shalee because she always gets up and has a smile, so she's tougher. She will go through a brick wall and keep going time after time.

Q: What's your favorite TV show?

A: Either 'One Tree Hill' or the 'Real World/Road Rules Gauntlet.'

Q: In a game situation, who wouldn't you want to have to guard?

A: I personally do not want to guard Courtney Parris. I'm going to keep that for J-Mac (Jessica McFarland) and JoAnn (Hamlin) and Marlies (Gipson). I'm going to guard wing players that do not outweigh me by 100 pounds.

Q: If you were stuck in an elevator – which Wildcat would you want to be stuck with?

A: Definitely Marlies. She's my roommate, and we could probably entertain ourselves with nothing in there for a couple of hours. Unless of course, she tries to beat me up.

Q: What do you listen to before a game to get you going?
A: I stole Marlies' Lil' Wayne CD, and that's what I listen to get ready.

Q: Are there any Facebook.com addicts on the Wildcat team?

A: Me. I am the Facebook addict. I think it's fun, and I have a lot of friends I keep in touch through it.

A: Which fight song is better – "Boomer Sooner" or the "Wabash Cannonball?"

Q: Oh, the Wabash Cannonball. The Sooners, we don't like them anymore.

Q: Any strange or unusual habits your teammates like to tease you about?

A: People give me crap for everything. I'm kind of the butt of all their jokes. I don't think I have any weird habits, but I put sugar on everything.

Q: Who is the better basketball player – you or your mom, Donna (who played basketball at North Dakota from 1980-84)?

A: If you don't tell my mom, I would say myself because I have a better outside shot than she does, but she can still throw some elbows (in the post) that catch me in the face.

Q: Are you superstitious?

A: I am superstitious. Every game, I try to redo my hair, put my makeup on a certain way, and I listen to the same CD, and there are always things I tell myself that are the same before every game.

Q: If you could play any other sport – what would it be?

A: I would like to say that I would run cross country because I ran in high school, but at the college level, it's so many miles. Probably tennis.

Q: What's your favorite home-cooked meal?

A: My mom's stir-fry and a lot of ice cream and all the sweets my mom can make.

Baylor forward Sophia Young could be the conference's best ever all-around player

By Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Baylor had a lot of firsts last year.

They won the Big 12 Championship for the first time in the history of the program. They won the Big 12 Tournament, defeating K-State 68-55 on what was supposed to be a neutral court, but dominated by purple in Kansas City, Mo.

Then, Baylor topped it off by winning the national championship – you guessed it, for the first time, knocking off three No. 1 seeds along the way.

With all of the first time accomplishments out of the way, Baylor senior forward Sophia Young is about to be the next No. 1 thing for the Bears.

When she steps onto the court for the final time on Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum, she already will be the Big 12 Conference leader with 56 double-doubles (pending tonight's game) and could be the conference's all-time leading rebounder if she pulls down 13 in tonight's home game against lowly Colorado, her final game in Waco, Texas.

There is one record, however, that will take a bit more time. Eventually, though, she will pick it up.

Going into her game tonight, Young only needs 106 points to pass former K-State player Kendra Wecker's record for total points that she just set a year ago.

"Every time we watch Baylor together, she's like, 'Sophia is going to get my record tonight,'" junior Claire Coggins said. "I tell her Sophia's a great player – nothing against Sophia Young, she's an awesome player, but Sophia has more games in the post season. Kendra missed five games of her senior season, and I tell Kendra, 'Just chill out, you're a special player.'"

Young is averaging 21.1 points per game and still has a minimum of four games remaining in her career, not including extra games during the Big 12 Tournament or games in the NCAA Tournament.

At her current streak, Young could break the record during the Big 12 Tournament, like Wecker did last season against Nebraska, surpassing former teammate Nicole Ohlde.

"She has experience, athleticism – she's an all-around player who is smart like a Kendra Wecker and a Nicole Ohlde. She's that good," senior Jessica McFarland said.

Young was the Most Outstanding Player in the NCAA Final Four last year, leading the Bears to a win against Michigan State in the title game.

This season, she was named a Player of the Year candidate and a pre-season Naismith Trophy and Wooden Award list player.

Young also was named the preseason Big 12 Player of the Year and was placed on the Big 12 Anniversary Team.

She is the only current player on the list, joining the two players she will soon pass up in the record books, Wecker and Ohlde.

"I'll be happy and sad to see Sophia go," Coach Deb Patterson said. "Happy because we don't have to line up against her and sad because she is one of my favorite players to watch compete in the game."

"Her intensity, heart, execution, her overall ability to board the game and carry a team on her shoulder along with the ability to score the ball, to defend – she truly is an amazing talent and as a coach, except when you're lining up against that player, you love watching players like that compete."

The spirit of support

Laughing at a comment, United States Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., delivers the 143rd Landon Lecture at K-State. Brownback is a K-State graduate in agricultural economics.

Senator visits greek house

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., visited the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity house Wednesday after his Landon Lecture.

But for Brownback the visit was not political but nostalgic. Brownback, a member of the fraternity until his graduation from K-State in 1979, said entering the house again was a homecoming.

Despite the more than 30 years since his graduation, Brownback said the feel of the fraternity was almost the same.

He did note the house's roughly $1 million renovation, which was finished in August 2004.

Nick Levendofsky, junior in agribusiness and AGR member, organized the visit.

Levendofsky said he first contacted Brownback's office a month and half ago to plan the visit.

But Brownback's busy schedule didn't leave much room for planning, Levendofsky said.

"I told him to let me know three to four weeks ahead of time so we could plan, and he called me last Monday," Levendofsky said.

The event was open to student leaders in the College of Agriculture, Blue Key members and Student Governing Association members, as well as members of the fraternity.

Ronny Pope, AGR president and senior in animal science, said he was happy to open the house for the event.

"It's a great opportunity for the house and for everyone on campus to come here and talk to him (Brownback) a personal level," he said.

Brownback, who received the AGR Brother of the Century award, gave a brief speech to attendees.

"It's good to be home. It's so much nicer, though," he said.

Brownback's Landon Lecture focuses on poverty aid, prisoner treatment

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Americans should use the opportunities they are given to help others, said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., Wednesday at the 143rd Landon Lecture in McCain Auditorium.

Brownback emphasized American exceptionalism, which he defined as "a greatness based on purity of purpose."

"But the question remains: who among you will have the bravery to turn the key?"

Brownback spoke of the deaths of former president Ronald Reagan, Rosa Parks and Coretta Scott King and the legacies they left behind.

"Their examples, their lives inspire us to carry the torch forward, inspire us to what we can be as a nation when we live up to our best traditions," he said.

Brownback also touched on the intertwined problems of poverty and prison recidivism in the United States and discussed the difficulty of creating support but not dependency.

"We recognize that they are bound by chains that they cannot break alone," he said.

A particular focus was faith-based prison systems, which he said have a recidivism rate of 10 percent — far lower than standard prisons where recidivism hovers above 60 percent. The difference, Brownback said, is a system that does more than just punish.

"Instead of treating prisoners as disposable, we're treating them as people with dignity," he said.

Brownback also emphasized what he called the best way out of poverty — work and marriage — and also discussed the problems faced by single mothers.

He mentioned a plan that would provide aid to couples below the poverty level by 200 percent or more.

During the question-and-answer session, an audience member asked Brownback why his plan does not help families led by homosexual couples.

Brownback said the bond of marriage has lost respect in areas where it is treated the same as same-sex unions and said the traditional family unit is the best option for child-rearing.

"I think the best thing for that is a man and woman bonded together for life in marriage," he said.

Justin Timken, junior in pre-nursing, said he agreed with Brownback's definition of a couple.

"I support marriage between one

Only 1 political candidate disqualified

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Only one Student Governing Association candidate was disqualified for not attending a mandatory meeting on Monday or Tuesday.

In 2005, 21 candidates were disqualified for not attending a mandatory meeting.

Elections Commissioner Tanner Banion said he sent e-mails about the meetings in addition to the advertisements and stories that appeared in the Collegian.

There have not been any other disqualified candidates in the election, Banion said.

Bill Harlan, assistant coordinator for the Office of Student Activities and Services, said the number of disqualifications was low in comparison to past years.

"We're happy with the number of people who attended the meetings to find out what they needed to know to start their campaigns," Harlan said.

Candidates who do not attend the meeting, fail to turn in expense reports or break other rules worthy of disqualification cannot obtain an office through write-in votes.

SGA hopefuls post campaign materials

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Posters, chalking, banners and other campaign materials are now on campus, marking the beginning of election season.

Posting campaign materials for the Student Governing Association primary elections began at 5 p.m. Tuesday.

In 2005, candidates could begin posting campaign materials the Sunday after the filing deadline.

Elections Commissioner Tanner Banion said the date for posting materials was moved back to Tuesday so candidates could attend a mandatory meeting and learn

8 people share jackpot

LINCOLN, Neb. — Eight workers at a Nebraska meat processing plant claimed the record $365 million Powerball jackpot Wednesday that, if split evenly, would give each about $15.5 million after taxes. The seven men and one woman all work at a ConAgra ham processing plant near the U-Stop convenience store where they bought the winning ticket last week. They won the biggest jackpot in U.S. lottery history.

Ports deal

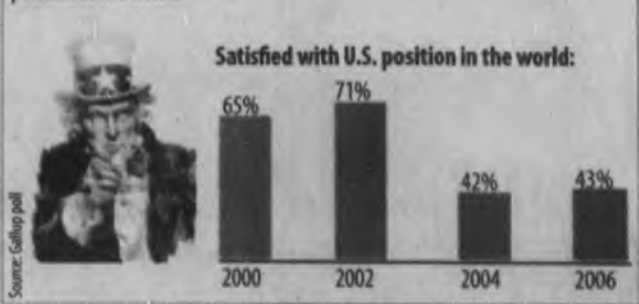

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush was unaware of the pending sale of shipping operations at six major U.S. seaports to a state-owned business in the United Arab Emirates until the deal already had been approved by his administration, the White House said Wednesday. Defending the deal anew, the administration also said that it should have briefed Congress sooner about the transaction.

Civil war warning

SAMARRA, Iraq — Insurgents detonated bombs inside one of Iraq's holiest Shiite shrines Wednesday, destroying its golden dome and triggering more than 60 reprisal attacks on Sunni mosques. As the gold dome of the 1,200-year-old Askariya shrine lay in ruins, leaders on both sides called for calm. But the attacks seemed to push the country closer to civil war than at any point since the overthrow of Saddam Hussein.

Development waits for next step in plan

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The Aggieville-Campus Edge District — a project to bring businesses and high-density housing to a 22-block area immediately east of campus and north of Aggieville — is in a holding period right now, but officials said they expect more development soon.

The plan, introduced in 2003, calls for commercial development on the north side of the 1100 and 1200 blocks of Bluemont Avenue modeled after Moro Street in Aggieville to achieve a more pedestrian-oriented shopping environment.

In the five blocks north of Bluemont, along Manhattan Avenue, the plans suggest high-density residential development in the form of apartments, townhomes and condominiums.

There also is hope that parking garages will be built on the north and south sides of Aggieville to ease traffic congestion in the area.

However, Cam Moeller, a city planner with the Manhattan Community Development Department, said the Campus Edge project basically is dormant and waiting for the next move.

"Momentum kind of ebbs and flows," Moeller said. "Where we're at right now, we're not actively pursuing the next step in this plan. It's kind of in a holding pattern right now, waiting for further direction."

"Some of this we may be waiting on direction from the City Commission as to how and when they want to proceed with this, and some of that probably has to come from the Aggieville Business Association."

According to the city's plans, which were developed by RTKL Associates, Inc., an architecture design firm, there are six actions for the city in the process of developing the Campus Edge district. They range from up-zoning the area for high-density living in Action One to actually securing development in Action Six.

Moeller said the city is somewhere between Actions One and Two — the processes of making any necessary revisions to the zoning of the area and establishing a balance of automobile transportation, biking and pedestrian sidewalks along Bluemont Avenue while considering appropriate financing for the project.

Jeff Levin, Aggieville Business Association member, co-owner of Varney's Book Store and one of the leaders of the Campus Edge project, said while there are no specific leads yet, the area of highest concern is building a parking garage.

"We are hopeful that some developers will step forward based on the planning to commit to a parking garage," Levin said. "I've been approached by various organizations, but none of them have made a formal commitment. I believe, one way or another, within the next five years, we'll probably kick off some type of parking structure with retail and other types of space available in that structure."

"It is still a key, paramount issue for all the Aggieville merchants."

While the project itself is on hold, there is some development going on in the area.

The Campus Bridge Lofts, a seven-story condominium complex at 820 Manhattan Ave., lies within the Campus Edge district, but is not part of the city's plans.

Jason Grantham, vice president of Blue Mountain Capital, the site's developer, and 1999 K-State graduate in construction science and management, said plans to build the lofts were in place before the Campus Edge project was announced.

"This was our idea, and this is just what we wanted to build here," Grantham said. "We went to school at K-State and lived in the house that was there, and we acquired the property, and this is just a project we wanted to go forward with."

"We've had real good interest. Obviously, when you're across the street from campus and Aggieville, you've got the students' interest."

Levin said, as for other development, students should not expect a lot to happen quickly, as large-scale projects such as the Campus Edge District don't happen overnight.

"We've gotten down to work, we done the studies, we've had our public meetings, and now things are just kind of rolling," he said. "It sometimes takes a couple years for a big project to kick off. All the dominoes have to fall the right direction for it to be pulled off."

CES workshop teaches dining etiquette

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Next week students can brush up on their manners at the Dining Etiquette workshop offered by Career and Employment Services.

The workshop provides students with a chance to learn proper eating behavior for a job interview.

"The workshop gives students new skills and the ability to navigate through a dinner interview," said Kevin Roberts, instructor of hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics.

It is suggested that students come dressed in business attire, as they would for a job interview. Students will eat a meal as they review proper dining. The workshop covers topics like dropped food, spilling food, cell phones and making conversation.

"We cover topics from how to properly use your napkin to chewing with your mouth closed," Roberts said.

The workshop is designed to aid students in getting hired by providing them with practical skills.

"A major benefit of the workshop is that down the road, students will know what to do to be prepared for a dinner interview, and this will increase the likelihood of getting a job," said Bryan Herwig, graduate student in business administration.

Table setting basics

1. Napkin. Place it on your lap after sitting down.
2. Salad fork. Sometimes a salad plate will be placed to the left of the napkin.
3. Dinner fork. It may be larger than the salad fork.
4. Dinner plate. It should be one inch from the edge of the table.
5. Knife. The blade should face the plate.
6. Teaspoon. It is normally placed to the right of the knife; use this spoon for the main course.
7. Soup spoon. Often it is bigger than the other spoon.
8. Bread plate and butter knife.
9. Dessert fork. If there is a spoon, it should be facing the opposite direction.
10. Water glass. It is placed above the knife.
11. Wine glass. It is placed below and to the right of the water glass.
12. Coffee cup and saucer. In some cases, the coffee and dessert utensils will be brought to the table after dinner.

TO THE POINT Table manners are essential for future careers

"Chew with your mouth closed. Elbows off the table. Eat slowly."

Table manners that might have annoyed us as children actually might be beneficial to us as adults.

Knowing proper etiquette is something that can advance both careers and relationships.

Many employers interview potential employees over lunch or dinner. This gives employers a chance to get more than just answers to their interview questions — they also get to see how the person they are interviewing acts in public.

Etiquette knowledge also can help in a career. Often a good way to impress clients is to meet with them for lunch or dinner.

Don't forget about that first dinner date with your special someone's parents. First impressions can mean everything.

For those of us who can't remember all the etiquette rules our parents tried to drill into our heads as children, there is still hope.

Ask your parents or grandparents for a refresher course, read a book on etiquette, look on the Internet or attend an etiquette class.

If you are comfortable with your table manners, you can spend less time worrying about which fork to use and why there is a little spoon at the top of your plate and more time thinking about what you are saying and how you are acting.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Oversized solution

Smoking ban in Lawrence establishments isn't the right answer

A lot of times in the United States, we find a threat and rip it apart to assure ourselves we are safer than the previous week. To battle these threats we form organizations that are loaded with good intentions but get carried away with the problem when we get too wrapped up in the issue.

One of these threats just won't go away, though. There are TV commercials to remind us, and, if you're lucky, random people will offer this information to you. It's an airborne disease, stale as you breathe it in through your nose — second-hand smoke.

As my roommate found out in Lawrence last month, this threat to our way of life is being taken out of proportion.

In case you missed it, in 2004, Lawrence decided to join the party and remove smoking from essentially all workplaces. This includes the bar the new 21-year-old decided to grace with his presence.

When he came home from what one would expect to be a great weekend, he could only recall the bars with anger. Every time he got that nic' fit he had to go outside into the cold and re-present his ID to the bouncers upon his return. I think it's safe to say he won't be hitting the bars in Jayhawk territory anytime soon.

But really, is second-hand smoke so dangerous Lawrence needed to throw all the tar-lungs out of its bars?

The answer might not be as concrete as you think, according to a study by James Enstrom of UCLA and professor Geoffrey Kabat of the State University of New York, Stony Brook.

The study followed 118,094 Californians between 1960 and 1998, paying special attention to the 35,531 adults who had spouses who smoked regularly. At the end of the study, no significant correlations were detected between second-hand smoke and cancer.

In other words, it might not be good for you, but there are certainly no facts to back up how bad of a problem bans similar to Lawrence's make second-hand smoke out to be.

Before we know the truth about the situation, let's try not to overreact for once. If our bars and restaurants think they'll do better by allowing their customers to smoke, it's their business.

If you don't want to be around smoke, Clean Air Manhattan has a list of friendly restaurants for you to choose from at www.cleanairmanhattan.org.

For once, that's as difficult as it has to be.

It requires no legal solution and no hard feelings. If the guy at the bar seat next to you decides to light a cigarette, just let him be.

If it bothers you that much, you can politely switch seats or let the owner know by taking your money and leaving.

I'm sure with enough people working toward it, the list of smoke-free restaurants will continue to grow.

Accountability needed for immigrant deaths

Nineteen people died after being shipped across South Texas and abandoned at a truck stop in Victoria, Texas, yet no one is being held accountable for their deaths.

The people put on trial all said it was someone else's fault. Still, some of them are accused of holding the 3-year-old son of a Honduran woman for ransom after the boy survived the ordeal.

Victor Sanchez Rodriguez, his wife, Emma Sapata Rodriguez, and Rosa Sarrata Gonzalez all were accused of being part of a smuggling ring responsible for trucking more than 70 immigrants from South Texas to Houston in May 2003, according to CNN.

The three, all U.S. citizens, fled to Mexico to avoid prosecution but were returned for trial.

The driver of the truck, a Jamaican citizen named Tyrone Williams, is facing a retrial on charges that could carry a death sentence.

The Rodriguez couple and Gonzalez were found guilty of conspiracy and several counts of smuggling and face possible life terms in prison when they are sentenced May 1, Reuters reported.

Why weren't they convicted of murder?

You don't cram more than 70 people into an airtight trailer and drive through Texas, of all places, and not expect them to die.

Even cattle trucks have holes in the sides so the cattle don't die on the way to the slaughterhouse.

Yet these people, human beings, who some think have more value than the average cow, were put in an airtight trailer.

They were so desperate for air, they punched out the tail lights to try to breathe.

The driver abandoned the truck at a rest stop and later sought treatment at a Houston hospital for extreme stress from finding the dead immigrants in his trailer.

Williams' defense attorneys said he had stopped several times in the journey to pass water through the broken tail lights.

Wouldn't that signify something was drastically wrong inside the trailer?

Why didn't he open the doors?

Williams didn't speak Spanish, according to Reuters, but when people are screaming and pounding on the doors, I don't think that really needs translation.

He is the only one who faces the death penalty when he is retried on all 58 counts against him.

I want to know how anyone, from the ringleader to the truck driver, had anything in mind other than making money and not getting caught.

Is Williams responsible? Yes. Should he be charged with murder? Yes.

So should all the other people involved in the deaths of those in the trailer.

And the defense attorneys for the Rodriguez couple and Gonzalez had the nerve to say it was the United States government's immigration laws that were to blame, as well as the fact that the defendants didn't know how far the people were being taken.

That's crap.

One defense attorney even was quoted by CNN as saying his client was performing a humanitarian service by "feeding, clothing and sheltering the immigrants."

So the immigrants were fed, clothed and sheltered, before being put into an airtight trailer and shipped across South Texas to die. And a 3-year-old was held for ransom so more money could be made off of his distraught mother.

I suppose it was to make up for all the money they couldn't get from the people who were already dead.

Album merges country, rock music

"Electric Rodeo"

Album review by Eileen Laux

Shooter Jennings, son of famed singers Waylon Jennings and Jessi Colter, has music in his veins. His sophomore album, "Electric Rodeo," shows his passion for music and his thirst to make a statement in that music.

Jennings
COUNTRY SINGER

Jennings begins the album with the title track "Electric Rodeo," which has a country twang with a rock sound.

The track has a catchy tune with a strong back beat. Much of the album is made up of slower, darker songs that talk about honky tonk and heartbreak.

Jennings' voice has a sweet sound to it. It is smooth but has a gritty sound that brings us into the country/rock genre.

Jennings tries to reinvent himself in almost every song.

While I applaud his effort, I was confused because some tracks didn't sound like him. "Some Rowdy Women" shows his range, but his voice is so deep I barely recognized it.

"Alligator Chomp" sounded like narration rather than an actual song; however, it provides an up-tempo beat with what sounds like a touch of Guns N' Roses in the background.

His second-to-last track, "Bad Magick," opens up to Jennings' hard-core side.

This track creates a dark feel, but the back beats and tempo establish it as one of the best songs on the album.

In the final track, "(The) Living Proof," he addresses the expectations he must live up to being the son of the famous Waylon Jennings.

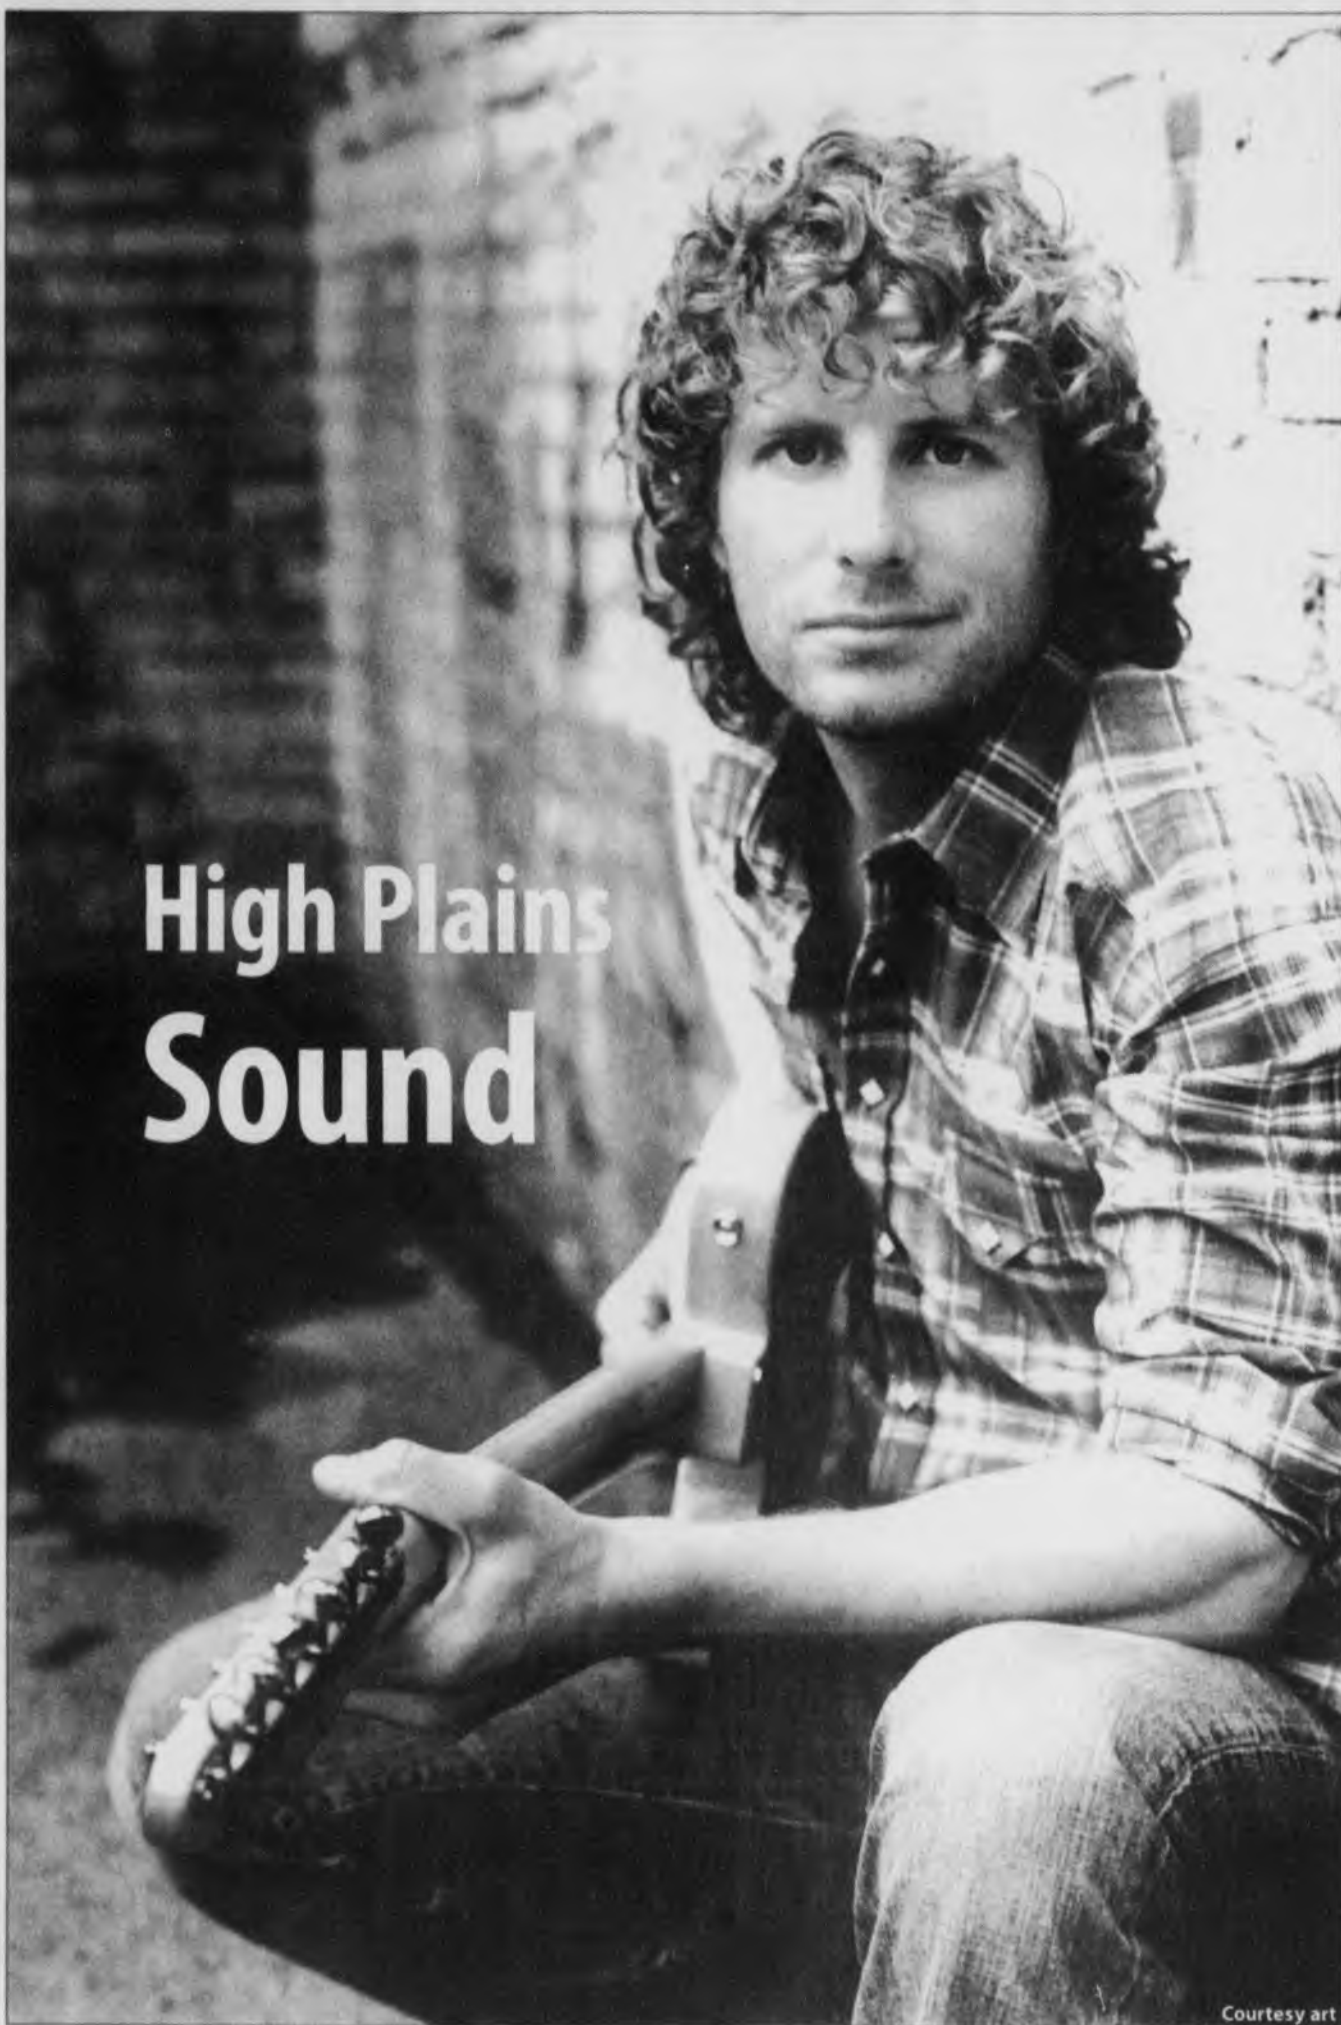

The album might have had some strange vocal choices and more slow songs than I would prefer, but it was a step in the right direction.

He tries to bring us back to the old country music with a touch of rock and an updated tempo.

Jennings doesn't try to play anyone with this album.

I would have liked to have seen a little more attitude behind some of the songs but in the end, it was a good album.

"Electric Rodeo" hits stores April 4.

Country singers Bentley, Jennings to perform tonight as part of 'Modern Day Drifter' tour

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If students don't go to the Dierks Bentley concert tonight, they might wonder later, "What Was I Thinkin'?"

The concert will begin at 7:30 p.m. at Bramlage Coliseum with Shooter Jennings, son of country singer Waylon Jennings.

There will be an intermission at 8:30 p.m., and Bentley will play from 9 p.m. to 10:30 p.m.

Jim Muller, manager of operations for K-State athletics, said the promoters approached him about having their artists play at K-State.

He said Bentley did well in Manhattan last year when he played at Country Stampede.

"The promoters like doing business at K-State," he said. "The relationship we have with them is very important."

Muller said the office has received several calls about Jennings, so he has a fan base in Manhattan, too.

"Shooter has never played in Manhattan, but I think he will do great, especially with the fans we have heard from," Muller said.

There will be a honky tonk party before the show to get the crowd involved, Muller said.

He said there are still seats left for the show and tickets, which are $25.50, will be sold at the doors.

The show is on the west side of Bramlage and parking also will be there.

Tickets will be sold at the northwest entry and box office.

Muller said students should go no matter what their taste in music.

If students would like to see more diverse artists in Manhattan, they must come and support the live music scene, he said.

"It will be a fantastic show," he said. "These guys really get after it and put on a great show. Whether you are a true country fan or not, it will be a good time. This show is for a true music fan."

Lisa Wieland, junior in pre-professional secondary education and employee at the Bramlage ticket office, said tickets went on sale Feb. 2, and there are about 600 left.

She said tickets will be sold at the doors until 9 p.m., and no student ID is needed to purchase a ticket.

She said she predicts the event will be close to selling out.

Wieland said she will attend the concert.

"I am a fan of country music, and I think it will be a good time," she said. "I am looking forward to seeing both Dierks Bentley and Shooter Jennings, and it is a break from school."

Matt Martinez, junior in biology, said he is a big fan of country music.

He said it is a privilege to be able to attend the concert and not have to pay for travel.

"I am going to get away and have some fun," he said. "Dierks Bentley sings new-age country."

He said students don't have to be fans of country music, just open to new ideas and new genres.

"It will be an affordable concert," he said. "I am glad both artists are coming. It will be an all-around good concert."

Web site bashes on Craig as new Bond

A group of angry James Bond fans have elected to just say no to Daniel Craig.

The 007 diehards have launched the Web site craignotbond.com to protest the selection of the first blond Bond, who will make his debut in the role of the iconic spy in the upcoming Casino Royale.

According to the site's founders, EON Productions made a poor and aesthetically displeasing decision when they chose Craig to take over Pierce Brosnan's license to kill.

"How can a short, blond actor with the rough face of a professional boxer and a penchant for playing killers, cranks, cads and gigolos pull off the role of a tall, dark, handsome and suave secret agent?" the site asks.

The anti-Craig activists have vowed to boycott Casino Royale and any subsequent films starring the "unknown and unattractive" actor as Bond.

Halls of College

By Clinton Smith

So, Clinton, we have a question for you.

Sure, go ahead.

Why did you create us? Do we sit around just for your entertainment, so that you make us look like idiots and make a profit off our misery?

Yeah, that is pretty much it.

I just figured that since you created us you could be nicer.

Hey, I asked the same thing of my creator, so stop complaining.

3 actors to showcase improvisational Shakespeare

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This weekend KSU Theatre will present "The Complete Works of William Shakespeare (Abridged)," an improvisational play that dramatizes all of Shakespeare's work.

Director Mathias Langford said the performance will feature only three actors: Bret Palmer, junior in theater; Ray Cherfant, sophomore in theater; and George Stavropoulos, senior in theater.

"The costumes are hilarious. They will definitely catch people's eyes," Langford said.

This comical play features all of Shakespeare's works including "Hamlet," "Romeo and Juliet" and "Antony and Cleopatra," with every role split between the three actors, and more than 40 costume changes.

"It's incredibly exhausting," Stavropoulos said. "This show is a very high-octane show. By the end of the night, I am in a complete sweat."

The show avoids a serious tone and instead aims at getting the audience involved, Langford said.

"There is lots of audience participation," he said. "The actors talk to the audience and make them chant certain things."

The audience will choose which Shakespeare plays they want to see, and the actors will perform them improvisational-style in less than two hours.

In acting there is the fourth wall, the barrier between the actors and the audience, Stavropoulos said. However, the cast attempts to overcome the fourth wall in this show.

"In this show there is no fourth wall whatsoever," Stavropoulos said. "This show is completely wink-wink, nudge-nudge with the audience."

The act is based on the input of the audience, he said.

Playing characters like Cleopatra and Juliet, Palmer performs in drag for most of the play.

"I find myself in an awkward position - not only changing clothes so quickly but putting on clothes that I am not familiar with, like brassieres," Palmer said.

Even for people who aren't familiar with any of Shakespeare's plays, the show will be entertaining Langford said.

Dolphins' Williams' failed potential

The NFL season officially concludes each year with the Pro Bowl. This year it occurred on Feb. 12, with the National Football Conference stars defeating the American Football Conference stars 23-17.

CEDRIQUE FLEMING

I wonder exactly what the players do between now and the beginning of training camp next fall.

Some players are trying to get contract extensions, while others are healing from late-season injuries, and some multi-millionaire athletes just like to party.

Miami Dolphins running back Ricky Williams reportedly violated the NFL's substance-abuse policy for a fourth time and faces a possible one-year suspension.

He already sat out an entire season in 2004 when he retired because a failed drug test would have resulted in a $650,000 fine and a four-game suspension.

Instead of sitting out the four games, he decided to attend California College of Ayurveda, where he studied the ancient Indian system of holistic medicine.

He returned to the NFL in 2005 and had to sit out the first four games because of the suspension he had yet to serve.

His first three suspensions were because of marijuana use, but ESPN.com's John Clayton reported the drug Williams was said to have tested positive for this time was not marijuana.

Williams is in the process of appealing the results of the drug test, and the appeal will take one to three months to resolve, Clayton said.

I hope he wins his appeal, because he is 29 years old, and most running backs start losing their ability in their early 30s, so he doesn't have much time left to be at the top of his game.

Regardless of his past, it is hard for me to believe he would put himself in the position to be busted for doing drugs again.

The sad part about this whole ordeal is, he has so much potential and could have gone down in history as one of the greatest running backs ever.

He already solidified himself as one of the best collegiate running backs when he won the 1998 Heisman Trophy with the Texas Longhorns and became the NCAA career-rushing leader with 6,279 yards (broken one year later by University of Wisconsin's Ron Dayne).

He holds or shares 20 NCAA records and led the Longhorns to a Cotton Bowl victory after rushing for 203 yards in his final collegiate game.

He was so good in college that the New Orleans Saints traded away all of their draft picks in the 1999 draft to take Williams No. 5 overall — the first time one player was the only draft pick of an NFL team.

Things didn't pan out in New Orleans, and Williams was traded to the Dolphins where, in his first season with the team, he led the league in rushing and earned his first Pro Bowl bid.

He only played in 12 games this season because of his suspension and was primarily a backup because the Dolphins drafted Auburn running back Ronnie Brown in last year to become the starter.

Williams rushed for 743 yards and had six touchdowns in 2005 and started three games at the end of the season because of an injury to Brown.

He has the talent to make the Pro Bowl for years to come, but we will probably never find out how great he could have been because he can't stop getting in trouble.

Cats fall to Longhorns after battling to the buzzer

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Once again, K-State proved it can play Texas close for 40 minutes, and once again, the Wildcats proved they have trouble winning close games.

K-State fought No. 7 Texas to the buzzer Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum, but Texas (23-4, 11-2) held on for a 65-64 victory.

It was K-State's (14-10, 5-8) eighth loss by five or fewer points this season.

"It's tough," Coach Jim Wooldridge said. "There's no question it's tough."

"I don't think our team played skittish down the stretch. I think we played to win. They made a play. We didn't."

From the tipoff, the odds were stacked against the Wildcats, who were forced to make do without starting point guard Clent Stewart, sidelined with a foot injury suffered in Saturday's game against Colorado.

In addition, the Wildcats had to play most of the game without their leading scorer and rebounder, junior Cartier Martin.

Martin picked up his third foul with 15:35 remaining in the first half and fouled out with 42 seconds left in the game.

Martin contributed with a season-low five points in 17 minutes.

"The third foul, it took him (Martin) out of rhythm," Wooldridge said. "I know he wanted to play Driving around Texas defenders, K-State's David Hoskins looks to pass Wednesday evening at Bramlage Coliseum. Hoskins brought in 16 points in the Wildcats' 65-64 loss to the seventh-ranked Longhorns.

The one that got away — again

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The game was over. Junior Mario Taybron just nailed a bittersweet 3-pointer with 1.5 seconds left, slicing Texas' win to 65-64. It almost happened — the upset of the country's No. 7 team was only one point away.

People left the court quickly, disappointed after another close loss — the eighth decided by five points or less, to be exact.

But there was one Wildcat fan who lingered to yell at Texas coach Rick Barnes before he got away.

"You got outplayed, Barnes," the woman yelled.

"Yeah, but we won," Barnes said in reply.

Was Barnes saying K-State outplayed Texas?

After the game, Coach Jim Wooldridge praised his team, complimenting his players on nearly every aspect of their game.

"I thought we played awfully well in a lot of different aspects," Wooldridge said, smiling. "We played outstanding defense in the second half against a team that can hurt you in all five spots. We got down the floor better, and I was really pleased with how well we guarded the pick-and-roll game."

This was true. K-State's tight man-to-man held the Longhorns — No. 3 in the Big 12 in field goal percentage at 47.3

— to only 33.3 percent shooting from the field in the second half. Texas — No. 1 in the conference in three-point percentage — couldn't connect from the three-point arc in the second half, finishing 0-5.

"They had really good defense. They played really hard," Barnes said.

Then there was the offense. Taybron, who filled in for sophomore Clent Stewart, had 12 points; sophomore David Hoskins added 16, and junior Lance Harris notched a game-high 18 points.

The Wildcats even outscored the Longhorns in the paint 30-24, despite Texas' big men down low, LaMarcus Aldridge and Brad Buckman. K-State's bench scoring dominated Texas' 23-2, and the Wildcats capitalized on turnovers with 10 points, compared to six Longhorn points.

How, then, did Texas come out on top?

"They made a play, and we didn't," Wooldridge said. "I don't think our team played skittish down the stretch or cautious. I think we played to win."

Maybe the Wildcats didn't win the game, but they did, according to certain statistics, one fan and maybe Barnes, outplay the Longhorns. That, in itself, is promising heading into the end of the season, Hoskins said.

"I still feel like our record doesn't describe our team," Hoskins said. "We still feel like we can beat anybody."

Tennis looks to improve in Oklahoma match

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team will be back in action at 3 p.m. today against Tulsa after taking a four-day vacation from competition.

The break, while short-lived, allowed the Wildcats to make a few adjustments before heading out to Tulsa, Oklahoma, to face the Golden Hurricanes. Coach Steve Bietau said building momentum from last weekend's matches with Utah and BYU has been the main focus in practice.

"We're going to try to take the things we did well and expand on those strong points and try to eliminate some of those mistakes," Bietau said.

BYU, ranked No. 20 in the nation, defeated the Wildcats 6-1 this weekend. Still, the loss cannot be viewed as a complete failure, Bietau said.

"Some of the progress that we tried to make through the weekend, BYU affected in the way they played," Bietau said. "That's not necessarily a bad thing to go out there and struggle."

Doubles play also has been an area of concern for the Wildcats, who have not won the doubles point since Jan. 29 against Drake. The doubles point is crucial, especially in close matches,

VLB | K-State team sets fall game schedule

After registering its 10th-consecutive NCAA Tournament appearance and seventh-straight 20-win season in 2005, K-State volleyball has set its fall schedule for the 2006 season. The Wildcats will face two NCAA Final Four teams, nine teams that reached the 2005 NCAA Tournament and six teams ranked in the final CSTV/AVCA Coaches Poll.

K-State will open the 2006 season at the Fresno State Invitational Aug. 25-27. The Wildcats begin the tournament with the host Bulldogs at 5 p.m. (PDT). The Wildcats will then face 2005 NCAA Final Four participant Santa Clara at 4 p.m. (PDT) Aug. 26. K-State concludes action in Fresno with the University of Pacific at 10 a.m. (PDT) Aug. 27.

The Wildcats make their Manhattan debut Sept. 1-2 in the Varney's Kansas State Invitational. K-State will face Wichita State in its opening match in Ahearn Field House.

OLY | U.S. hockey team out of Olympics

TURIN, Italy — Shot after shot slid through Rick DiPietro's pads, caromed in off his body and bounced the U.S. men's hockey team out of the Olympics.

Olli Jokinen scored two power-play goals in the second period for Finland, which recovered after blowing an early two-goal lead and beat the United States 4-3 Wednesday night in an Olympic quarterfinal game.

The U.S. team never got going in Turin. It struggled to score when the goaltending was good and played poor defense when the goals finally came.

NBA | Knicks acquire Francis from Magic

ORLANDO — Steve Francis was traded Wednesday from the Orlando Magic to the last-place New York Knicks for Penny Hardaway and Trevor Ariza.

Francis is averaging 16.2 points to lead the Magic, but the star guard has feuded with Coach Brian Hill this season. By dealing him for Hardaway's expiring contract, the Magic will get salary cap relief.

In New York, Francis will be teamed with another shooting guard in Stephon Marbury, forming one of the league's most expensive backcourts. The deal came a day before the NBA trading deadline.

MLB | Dessens gives

Royals veterans presence

SURPRISE, Ariz. — In one sense, Elmer Dessens is about a 500 pitcher.

He has made 135 starts in his seven-year major league career. And he has made 142 relief appearances.

For the Kansas City Royals, who signed him to a two-year contract, he will probably do some of each.

The Royals, who need help just about everywhere following a 106-loss season, figure on using him in lone relief.

Last year with the Los Angeles Dodgers he had seven starts and 21 relief appearances.

man and one woman, and Sam is right on track with if we legalize homosexual marriage how socially detrimental it would be," he said.

However, Jeff Smith, president of KSU Young Democrats and senior in political science, said he disagreed.

"I think he's got a lot to account for when he says that every person, every soul is equal in the eyes of God and the eyes of government," he said. "He's going to have to do some explaining at some point when he can say that as a monitor and then say flatly that he is going to deny these rights because these people are homosexual."

Lately, Brownback has garnered media attention for his bipartisan Darfur Accountability and Peace Act which aims to stem the violence in Darfur, Sudan, that many, including Brownback, refer to as genocide.

Brownback talked about the spread of malaria, violence in the Sudan and Congo, gang rapes during war, kidnapped children and forcibly trained as soldiers and the problems associated with financial aid, notably corruption and waste.

He said the most effective way for people to understand the situation is to see it themselves.

"You need to go to Africa, people-to-people style," Brownback said.

Brownback also briefly talked about federal efforts to end deaths by cancer by 2015, to use ethanol and electricity as a means of ending fuel dependency, to streamline some areas of government and to create an alternative flat tax.

During the question-and-answer period after his speech, Brownback fielded questions on topics ranging from what it means to be an American to stem cell research, healthcare and the separation of church and state.

One student asked Brownback about his involvement in the Seoul Train documentary, a film that chronicles the movement of North Koreans into China.

Brownback said the similarities between the United States' underground railroad, which operated in Kansas, and the plight of North Koreans fleeing from a regime he called "horrific" first drew him to the documentary.

A man Brownback allowed to comment after the question period was officially concluded asked to meet with the senator after the lecture about his daughter-in-law's approaching deportation.

According to The Kansas City Star, Myrna Dick's two-year legal battle against deportation ended Feb. 15 when the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals sided with immigration officials to allow the deportation to continue.

Brownback agreed to meet with Dick and her 17-month-old son, Zachary, after the show.

Although Brownback listed many goals, he stressed that change cannot occur from far away or by others.

"Don't look for change, for you are the change. You are the revolution," he said.

TENNIS | Players focus on increasing intensity during play sophomore Olga Klimova said.

"There is still some work to do in our doubles because it is important to get the doubles point in matches," Klimova said. "We need to focus on the match and play like we can."

K-State and Tuisa have not faced off in a duel match since 1999. Therefore, Bietau said he will be relying on scouting reports he received through other coaches. Scouting reports, while helpful in formulating strategies, can be tricky for some players, Bietau said.

"It depends on the player," Bietau said. "Some players are able to take information like that and implement it into what they do and take advantage of it. For other players, who aren't as sophisticated in their thought process, it's a distraction for them."

The importance of having a plan and sticking with it also has been stressed during the recent time off, Bietau said.

However, overthinking and not reacting also can cause obstacles, senior Jessica Simosa said.

"Sometimes I feel that I'm thinking too much about what I'm going to do instead of doing it," Simosa said. "So it's not natural yet."

The Wildcats will attempt to carry the momentum built up last weekend into these next few matches and play with a higher level of intensity, Simosa said.

"We want to continue working on being aggressive, so we can be automatic for our next few matches," Simosa said. "It's really hard to play that way. It requires a lot of effort, for one thing, and you got to pay attention so that you can do it naturally."

to Tuesday. Senate Operations Committee changed it back at the end of the 2005 school year, Sager said.

"I guess this led to some problems, so I can understand why it was moved back to Tuesday," Sager said.

Banion said there already have been several minor violations in posting materials.

"I've noticed certain, very minor things like not tying all four corners on tree posters," Banion said. "They have been taken care of with candidates."

Banion said he will contact candidates if he finds a violation in posting materials and set a deadline to fix it by. If the violation is not fixed by the deadline, the candidate will be issued a formal violation.

great tonight."

Martin, scoreless in the first half, shot just 1-of-7 from the field and misfired on a 3-pointer that could have given K-State its first lead with 5:20 to go.

Then, with K-State trailing 61-60, junior guard Lance Harris missed three crucial shots in the final 2:13, each of which could have given K-State the lead.

After junior guard Akeem Wright fouled Texas guard Kenton Paulino with 16 seconds left, Paulino calmly sunk two free throws to make it a three-point game.

With three seconds left and Texas still clinging to a three-point lead, sophomore guard David Hoskins was fouled and made his first free throw, closing Texas' lead to two points.

Hoskins intentionally missed the second free throw to give K-State a chance for a rebound, but he failed to hit

Harris then committed a quick foul on Paulino, who once again knocked down both free throws to make it a four-point game.

Junior guard Mario Taybron hit a three-pointer at the buzzer, but it was too little, too late for the Wildcats.

Despite the loss, Wooldridge said he was pleased with his squad's effort, but it simply couldn't make enough plays down the stretch.

"We gave ourselves every opportunity to win the ballgame doing the things we had to do," Wooldridge said.

RCPD officials arrest Harris

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lance Harris, junior in social science and guard for the K-State men's basketball team, was arrested on two outstanding warrants for failure to appear Thursday. Harris was the passenger in a car stopped for traffic infractions on Anderson Avenue and Mid Campus Drive, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said.

Police checked Harris' identification and found 14 parking violations dating back to May 19, 2005, Quintanar said.

Harris was arrested on eight charges of parking in a no parking zone, five charges of parking without a permit between 2 a.m. and 9 a.m., and one charge of over-parking in a two-hour parking zone.

Bond for those infractions was $315.

While at the Riley County Police Station, Harris also was charged with failure to appear on a Dec. 1, 2004, Wabaunsee County charge of exceeding the maximum speed limit, Quintanar said.

Total bond was $1,315.

Underneath a bench at City Park, the post office and the Zoological Park are a few locations where a book can be found as part of BookCrossing.

"Bookcrossing" was added to the Concise Oxford English Dictionary in August 2004 as "the practice of leaving a book in a public place to be picked up and read by others, who then do likewise."

Inspired by the concept of Web sites like WhereasGeorge.com, a site that tracks the journey of dollar bills; Ron Hornbaker, BookCrossing co-founder, decided to do something different. While with his wife at their home in Kansas City, Mo., he said he thought of BookCrossing.

of BookCrossing.com. Hornbaker said he and Mehra-Pederson's husband, Bruce Pederson, went to college together. He said he immediately contacted the Pedersons with his idea.

BookCrossing.com was released on April 17, 2001. The members and founders of BookCrossing.com refer to the site as a labor of love. Mehra-Pederson said the growth of BookCrossing.com is beyond her wildest dreams.

"I am amazed by the generosity and spirit of this far-flung community," Mehra-Pederson said. "They have humor, passion, wit, intelligence and true heart. It is truly a global phenomenon that is bringing community and life to people throughout the world."

Mehra-Pederson said the site has most frequently been described as a cross between a treasure hunt and a message in a bottle.

"With over 25 million hits per month, and almost 443,000 members in 120 countries, we are growing by 350 members a day," Mehra-Pederson said.

Expense reports for primary candidates due

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Campaign expense and contribution reports are due by 4 p.m. today in the Office of Student Activities and Services for primary election candidates.

Elections Commissioner Tanner Banion said failure to submit an expense report will result in disqualification from elections.

"If you are disqualified from a race for any reason, you cannot receive a write-in," Banion said.

Each receipt from campaign spending must be itemized and attached to a summary page. Candidates must also submit a contribution report and final expense report, Banion said.

All campaign materials must be purchased before the expense report deadline, according to the Elections Regulations Code.

Candidates must submit an expense report even if they do not spend money on their campaign, Banion said.

The total amount a presidential ticket may contribute toward its campaign cannot exceed more than $800 for the primary and general election combined, according to the Elections Regulations Code.

Candidates can exceed the spending limit by five percent without being disqualified, but there are penalties for going over the spending limit, Banion said.

"They will be determined on an individual basis, and there is not a set penalty," he said.

There have been an insignificant number of disqualified candidates in the past for not turning in expense reports, said Bill Harlan, assistant coordinator for Office of Student Activities and Services.

Elections '06

Voting for SGA primary elections begins Feb. 28 and ends March 1. Vote at sgaelections.k-state.edu.

"There are usually a couple, but not very many," he said.

Harlan said submitting a campaign expense report is simple.

"As long as they're keeping track of what they're spending and keeping receipts, it's pretty simple," he said.

The K-State Rodeo events haven't changed much in the past 50 years, although the competition has.

"Bulls have been bred and there are super athletes now," said Steve Frazier, former adviser for the K-State Rodeo Club. "The entire sport is very competitive."

This is the 50th-straight year for the K-State Rodeo. Frazier, who served as the club's adviser from 1992 to 2001, said fans will notice how the athleticism of rodeo athletes has increased in the past 50 years because of specialization.

Student Senate introduces Fine Arts funding bill

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate introduced legislation regarding Fine Arts funding regulations at its meeting Thursday night.

One of the introduced bills would amend Fine Arts funding regulations. The Office of Student Activities and Services had an internal audit conducted, and necessary changes were found that needed made for Fine Arts funding regulations, according to the proposed legislation.

Some of the changes made would include funding for clothing that would remain with the department after its use, unless related to costumes for a performance.

Another change would include limited travel funding to $1,000 per group, per fiscal year.

"Most of these guidelines relate to leaving items with the department after their use because we as students are paying for them to present their art," Privilege Fee Committee Chair Matt Wagner said.

A bill that would increase the Fine Arts privilege fee was also introduced at Thursday's meeting. If passed, Fine Arts student organizations would be allocated an additional $5,000 in funding per fiscal year.

In other business, Senate Operations Committee Chair Brandon Sager said two bills introduced at Student Senate on Feb. 16 were held in committee for one week.

One bill would combine the duties and responsibilities of the Student Affairs and Social Services Standing Committee and the Academic Affairs Committee.

The other proposed legislation is a bylaws amendment that would make the Student Senate Representative to Faculty Senate the chair of the new Student and Academic Affairs Committee.

Dodgeball club offers fast action

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fifteen men stand at the end of the gym, sweat dripping from their faces, hands dangling at their sides in anticipation.

One voice echoes in the gym, "On your marks, get set, dodgeball!"

Sneakers squeak on the floor as they sprint to the middle of the floor, where a line of yellow and purple balls beckons for a game of dodgeball.

Brian Yates, junior in mass communications, said he loves the game of dodgeball for the seconds of fame that make underdogs winners.

"It's those moments that you shine and grab eight balls and peg, like, three dudes and win the game," he said.

Yates said dodgeball club began during fall 2004. Now club president, Yates said he was drawn into the club after seeing some chalking on campus.

In the past year, Yates said the group has had as many as 50 in attendance, but the club now averages 20 to 25 players.

Games are fast-paced, Yates said, and keeping alert is key to staying in the game.

"If you're not paying attention, you'll get decapitated," Yates said.

Strategies might vary, but Yates said being accurate with throws is important.

"It's really just throwing below, aiming for the ankles," he said. "You have to have good peripheral and good catching abilities. You have to be fast."

Deflecting a ball with another ball in hand is against the rules — something that might differ from the days of playing in middle school. Yates said the rule is needed because games would otherwise be too long.

Dodgeball club meets from 9 to 11 p.m. Tuesdays in Ahearn Field House gymnasium. A $5 fee is required each semester to participate.

While most club members are K-State students, meetings are open to anyone with connections to the university or with friends in the club.

Yates said the club is looking to participate in a tournament during the last weekend of spring break in Chicago.

Stephen Harris, junior in civil engineering, said the game is not difficult.

"It's a good way to relieve stress," Harris said. "You get to throw a rubber ball at people."

Miles Duncan, junior in sociology, played dodgeball in junior high and high school and said the game has not changed.

Although he has played for years, Duncan said the strategy to keep away from the ball is still the same.

"There are some people who can throw with enough grease lightning on the ball to kill a small animal," Duncan said. "My strategy is to not get hit in the game."

Konza docent training begins this weekend

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Docent training begins Saturday at the Konza Prairie Research National Area, 100 Konza Prairie Lane.

Docent training is every Saturday morning through mid-May, and again in September. The training sessions will be from 9 a.m. to noon, and attendance is required, said Annie Baker, educational program assistant for the Konza Prairie.

The first session will offer orientation and introductions to the Konza Prairie.

"It's open for anybody to come and check out our program to see if it's right for them," she said.

Baker, a 2003 K-State graduate in park management and conservation, said she has worked at the Konza Prairie since graduating from K-State. The initial classes will inform docents about the history of the Konza Prairie, ecology and botany, Baker said.

The docent program has between 10 and 15 volunteers each year, Baker said.

The training offers specialized training in the Konza Prairie and tall grass prairies, guiding hikers and van tours of bison herds.

"We have a lot of people who do all sorts of stuff," said Eva Horne, K-State instructor of biology and interim director of Konza Prairie, said.

Volunteers for the docent program vary, Horne said.

Anyone from the community can work as a docent, and the amount of time volunteered varies, Horne said.

The training sessions will be conducted outside on the hiking trails, Baker said.

"You do not need to have a degree in biological or natural science, — just have an interest in the out of doors," Baker said.

MAC to present play 'Steel Magnolias'

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Arts Center's performance of "Steel Magnolias" will open tonight in front of an expected sold-out crowd.

"We've already sold out for opening night, and there seems to be a lot of excitement about it," said Shauna Tominey, marketing and program director for the center.

The cast consists of six main characters, all of whom are played by local actors who have volunteered their time. More than 30 women auditioned for the play in early January.

Written by Robert Harling, the play is based on the true story of Harling's sister, who died of complications from diabetes.

Director Dwight Tolar said the play is sad, but uplifting.

"What I discovered through the whole process and rehearsals is the play is about finding purpose through acceptance," said Tolar, instructor of speech communication, theater and dance.

In keeping with a beauty salon theme, several local beauty salons

"Steel Magnolias"

Where: Manhattan Arts Center

How much: $12 for adults, $10 for military, $5 for children, $9 for students and $5 for student walk-ins for Thursday and Sunday performances donated props for the show, as well as prizes to give away during intermission, including haircuts, massages and a full-spa treatment.

Some salons also are giving out certificates that can be redeemed to save money on tickets.

"Steel Magnolias" is sponsored by BG Consultants, Inc. While funding is often divided between various sponsors, BG Consultants, Inc. donated the entire amount for this play, said Penny Senften, executive director of the arts center.

The arts center sponsors four shows every year. The arts center tries to offer a variety of shows to appeal to everyone, Senften said.

"We try to get a mix — there's always a musical, always a comedy and something that has a little more weight to it," Senften said.

TO THE POINT Students should celebrate rodeo's 50-year tradition

Every season, fans turn out in droves to support the K-State football team. The loyalty continues into the basketball season and should spill over into another event. The K-State Rodeo team performs this weekend in Weber Arena, and this is the only chance to see the rodeo on the K-State campus. If the closest students have been to Weber Arena is Call Hall for ice cream, they should venture into the arena and see what has made the rodeo a tradition for 50 years at K-State.

Members of the rodeo team spend hours practicing for an eight-second bull ride. The bareback riding, team roping, calf roping and rodeo queen competitions are more involved than the names suggest, and for those who have never been to a rodeo, this is the chance to see what country singers croon about.

Students who have never swung into the saddle of a horse can find entertainment in watching the rodeo and have fun cheering for fellow students. People come from all over the region to compete and watch, making it second only to the college national finals in fan attendance. K-State students who don't attend are missing out on an opportunity to be a part of a tradition that shapes K-State's image, and not as a hick school but as a campus with a student body that supports all of its teams and isn't afraid to get a little dusty in the process.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

There is this book I own that has an insightful phrase scrawled on each one of its pages. Its instructions for use say, "Open it, and whatever you need to know is there."

I think those same instructions could apply to my life. It's like each day is a random page, and if I pay enough attention, there is something there for me to learn.

In my last column, I mentioned something about coincidences. After I wrote about them, I began to perceive an abundance of them. Their magnitude varied, but nonetheless the occurrences were coincidental.

However, a large coincidence really shifted my awareness to this phenomenon. I recently decided I want to go into radio instead of television, which I have experience in. I have no experience in radio yet.

Within a day of making this decision, I overheard a casual conversation of a KSDB-FM 91.9 disc jockey. She was talking about how they needed some DJs. I couldn't help but think that my accidental eavesdropping was incredibly convenient.

Does this type of thing happen to anyone else?

Anyway, that is all just a prologue up until this point.

Sometimes Manhattan consumes me. I become too preoccupied with ways I have acted in the past. I become too concerned with what other people are doing. I mull over the uncertainty of my future.

In short, my sense of security becomes rattled.

Really, I should just forget all that and focus on my happiness right now. After all, I alone have the ability to overcome this nervous tension by maintaining a calm, confident, cheerful state of mind.

To try and regain this perspective, I decided to take a vacation from Manhattan and go home for the weekend to escape my pestering thoughts. Once there, my mom gave me this book called "The Celestine Prophecy."

Its cover tells of an ancient Peruvian manuscript that has been discovered. This document contains an important secret: the nine insights the human race is predicted to grasp sequentially. This supposedly will usher humanity into a new era of true spiritual awareness. Its predicted commencement is around the 2000-year mark.

After the weekend, I was intrigued, so I read the first chapter and was startled by its contents. The first insight reveals that in each of our lives, mysterious coincidences occur — sudden, synchronistic events that, once interpreted, lead us to our true destiny.

I was starting to think my life was strange. Despite being tired, I read the second chapter.

The second insight emphasizes the necessity of considering a new kind of historical perspective. In Medieval times, all phenomena of life — death, disease, natural disasters — is defined either as the will of God or as the malice of the devil. That is, until the development of the scientific method.

By the 1600s, astronomers proved beyond a doubt that the sun and stars do not revolve around the Earth, like the church maintained. Having lost its place at the center of God's universe, humankind's spiritual security was replaced by a preoccupation with economic security.

And so we harnessed the resources of the Earth for awhile, which leads us up to now — the natural systems of the planet polluted, depleted, and on the verge of collapse. Unable to go further, we are left to wake up from our preoccupation and reconsider our original question. What's behind life on this planet?

I finish writing my column and look around the coffee shop in which I am seated. I see evidence of preoccupation — stressed students studying, an older man following his money in the Wall Street Journal. Out of the crowd, I spot a kid smiling as he slowly picks off bites of his muffin — I catch a glimpse of awareness.

As I am packing up my laptop, the book that I mentioned at the beginning of my column falls out of my backpack and opens. I look at the page on the right, "Shop for security over happiness and you buy it — at that price."

Columnist vents about Facebook profile quotes

Everyone is tired of hearing how addicted they are to Facebook. They realize it has almost entirely overtaken their existence, and the thrill of being added by a new anonymous friend is similar to that warm, fuzzy feeling one gets when they fall in love.

I'm not here to say that I'm any different, and I'm definitely not here to preach about the evils of that irritating reason I'm up so late: good ol' Facebook. No, I'm here for a more specific reason.

Facebook quotes.

Allow me to expand. On a recent night, my roommate and I were up late drinking Mountain Dew and eating pickles, a somewhat new pastime of ours. Once the pickle excitement ran dry, we looked toward a new form of entertainment: reading random people's profiles on Facebook.

I began to notice a trend. The more profiles I read, the more people, usually women, I saw who had the most ridiculous quotes in that particular section of their Facebook profile. Furthermore, I began to see that they fell into one of three categories.

The first category I have dubbed the "Look at us" group.

The quotes falling into this category are probably the more prevalent. These confusing quips are those drunken (usually) one-liners your friends utter at their least-proud moment, and you found it absolutely necessary to record it for the world to see. The only problem is, the average profile reader has absolutely no idea about what you are talking.

They weren't there; they didn't see the spittle dripping off your friend's chin as she crashed down the stairs and screamed, "Happiness is a slice of raw meat," or something equally hilarious. It is funny only to you and probably not even to the friend who cringes every time she reads it.

However, I admit I am horrendously guilty of screaming "Facebook quote" at random moments of crazy hilarity and rushing to my computer to record it, so please don't judge me, I beg of you.

My next category I have prepared are what I call "Sunshine Quotes." These probably are what I would consider to be the most irritating.

In an effort to appear deep and thoughtful, many quotes I have seen are such meaningful ones like, "A cloudy day is always followed by rays of golden sunlight." These quotes often include complex words and phrases like "rainbow, friendship, forever love," and perhaps the occasional "fuzzy teddy bears."

The problem with these quotes is they're so blindingly obvious and cheesy that an eye-roll is pretty much necessary when reading them. As an FYI to all of these quote-holders, having "Love is the glue that holds the world together" as a Facebook quote doesn't win you a lot of "Hey, look how smart I am" points. Just a tip.

The final area I have grouped together is movie quotes, which I have creatively named, "Movie Quotes." Yes, "Napoleon Dynamite" was a funny movie, as was "Anchorman," and every other movie made by Will Ferrell.

However, I don't think the stars of these films are individuals worthy of quoting. Repeating a line somebody else wrote doesn't take a lot of thought, but hooray for you. They're funny, and I laughed profusely at them when viewing the movie, but reading them on your profiles just doesn't quite have the same effect.

I love Facebook, and I love reading mindless quotes and laughing on the inside at them, perhaps even the occasional outside chuckle. I even enjoy adding them onto my own profile, then feeling slightly ashamed of my own idiocy when re-reading them. So rule on, Facebook quotes. You give me a reason to read on, lose sleep and eat pickles with my roommate.

Week focuses on body image

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Be Comfortable in Your Genes" is the message that Sensible Nutrition and Body Image Choices hopes to get across during Eating Disorder Awareness Week, Sunday through March 3, said Dianna Schalles, nutritionist at Lafene Health Center and SNAC adviser.

The week concentrates not only on eating disorders, Schalles said.

"We focus on eating disorders," she said. "We also focus a lot on having a positive body image, so many students can benefit from the activities."

Stephanie Davis, sophomore in life-span human development and EDAW co-coordinator, said this week is meant to help students learn to have a positive body image and be comfortable with themselves.

"I think that this week is very important because body image is a pressing issue in today's society. SNAC's goal through this week is to really try to promote positive body image and to help students recognize what makes them unique," she said.

The week will begin at 7 p.m. Monday in the Union Big 12 room with belly dancing.

According to the Lafene Health Center Web site, students will learn the history of belly dancing and how it relates to positive body image, and then students will get to participate.

"I am most excited about the belly dancing," said Melissa Haug, senior in dietetics, public health and nutrition and SNAC treasurer. "It is a fun and unique way for people to get comfortable with their body, while providing a warm and friendly atmosphere."

Nationally recognized speaker and author Leigh Cohn will speak at 7 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Ballroom. Cohn will give a speech titled, "Let's Talk About Men's Bodies ... and Women's Too!"

"His speech is dynamic and very interesting and should provide a unique and interesting perspective on the topic," Davis said.

The week will finish up with Fearless Friday: A Day Without Dieting from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the Union Food Court. Students will be offered free hot chocolate and treats, according to the Web site.

"A day without dieting can help everyone try to relax, and appreciate their body for what it is," said Angie Hasemann, senior in nutrition, exercise science and dietetics and SNAC public relations chairperson.

Davis said she hopes by doing all the activities students will be able to become more comfortable with their bodies.

"With all the different activities, from belly dancing, to the speaker, to Fearless Friday, I hope students will really learn to appreciate their bodies and their genetics," she said.

Throughout the week SNAC members also want students to know there is help available if they do suffer from a problem.

"Society seems to either promote or shun eating disorders, two extremes that only make the problem worse," Hasemann said. "Those suffering from this kind of illness need to know help is available. Everyone needs to be encouraged to love and appreciate their bodies."

UGB discusses Union's anniversary

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Union Program Council discussed the 50th anniversary events and plans at 4 p.m. Thursday.

Six students from UPC and Ben Hopper, Union program adviser, attended a convention Feb. 17-22 in Boston.

"It was an amazing experience," said Nacole Boan, junior in political science and president of UPC.

"We got to see some great bands, comedians and magicians. We have some really good ideas and hope to bring amazing things to the Union next year."

Hopper said he also enjoyed the trip and appreciated the chance to see celebrities like Lewis Black and Judy Gould.

"It was a really good opportunity for them to get to know each other and to bounce ideas off other universities," Hopper said.

"It was a pretty cool experience."

The 50th anniversary of the Union will be celebrated March 1-11.

Tibetan Monks will create a sand painting for everyone to watch March 1 in the Union Courtyard. UPC will co-sponsor the event with the International Programs Office.

"I saw them in Boston, and it is really, really cool," Boan said.

"It's cool because you can look over it and watch the progression."

This event is the first of others leading up to the Union's birthday March 8 and the gala on March 11, which is invite-only. The birthday party is open to everyone and will be in the Union Courtyard from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. March 8. There will be free cake, circus-themed activities and live music.

It also was announced that a proclamation has been proposed to Governor Kathleen Sebelius to make the week of March 6-11 K-State Student Union Week and March 8 K-State Student Union Day.

Another topic of business was that the Union is looking into buying new bowling lane machines in the recreation area.

"They are 11 years old and have given us trouble," said John Connaughton, associate director of the K-State Student Union.

Students have approached Terri Eddy, Union recreation manager, about having the recreation area stay open until 1 a.m. on Thursdays.

"I think the weekends kind of start on Thursdays here anyway, so they're entertaining that idea," Connaughton said.

This weekend, "Walk the Line" will be shown at 8 to-night, 7 and 10 p.m. Saturday and 8 p.m. Sunday in Forum Hall.

Track and field set for Big 12 Indoor Championships

Breanna Eveland successfully completes a jump Jan. 28 at Ahearn Fieldhouse. K-State will compete in the Big 12 Conference Championships this weekend in Nebraska.

Christopher Hanewinkel COLLEGIAN

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track team will compete this weekend at the Big 12 Conference Indoor Championships at the Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln, against a field containing five Olympians, 16 NCAA champions and 58 All-Americans.

"This is a meet where 10 points are going to separate maybe third and seventh place," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "When it's that close, you have to excel across the board."

One All-American competing for K-State is senior high-jumper Kyle Lancaster. Lancaster was named the Big 12 Male Athlete of the Week for his school-record tying jump of 7 feet, 5.25 inches at the KSU Open last weekend.

"I think this is one of the best men's teams we've taken in a few years," Lancaster said. "If everybody does what they're capable of doing, it should be a good meet for us."

Last year, senior Christian Smith won his second-straight conference title in the 1000-meter run with a time of 2 minutes, 24.32 seconds, marking the third consecutive year a K-State runner won the event. Erik Sproll won in 2003.

Smith set the men's national collegiate record Feb. 3-4 at the Seivigne Husker Invitational with a time of 2:19.57.

Senior Coby Cost and sophomore Morgan Bonds also have 2005 titles to defend this weekend — Cost in the weight throw and Bonds in the 600-yard spring.

For the women, senior Breanna Eveland enters the Championships after winning her fifth-straight pole vault crown — eighth of the season — with a jump of 13 feet, 5.25 inches in the KSU Open. She has won 13 of her last 16 career events.

"I just want to go in and compete as well as I can," Eveland said. "I can jump high."

The native of Grand Rapids, Mich., can do just that. Earlier this season, she led the nation in the pole vault for a week with a clearance of 14 feet, 1.25 inches at the Husker Invitational that broke a K-State record and made her the first Wildcat female ever to break 14 feet indoors or outdoors.

"I want to come out on top," she said. "I'm not sure where our team will end up. It depends on who shows up and who doesn't."

With several other Wildcats winning event titles at the KSU Open, Rovelto said he didn't want to single out any athletes in particular, because every point was so important.

"In a meet that is this close, every single point you can get you want," he said. "Your big scorers need to get it done, but in the end, everyone must excel to get you in that top half."

CFB | Prince to speak at fundraiser in Horton

Football coach Ron Prince will speak on Sunday at Horton High School in Horton, Kan., to help raise money for a wooden basketball court at Everest Middle School, said Keith Olsen, a referee in the area.

Prince

Doors for the banquet will open at 2:30 p.m., with a silent auction beginning then and continuing throughout the afternoon. Prince will arrive at 3:30 and will speak at 4:00, followed by the auction giveaway at 5:00 and prepaid dinner at 5:30.

Gifts to be auctioned off include three sets of football tickets — two sets for the Marshall game and one set for the Florida Atlantic game; two tickets for K-State vs. Kansas basketball game Mar. 4; and a football signed by Prince and picture with the coach.

All proceeds go to the efforts to put in the wooden basketball court.

There are 500 tickets available for purchase, and 150 have been sold. General admission tickets will be available at the door — $10 for adults and $5 for kids — and a prepaid $25 ticket includes the meal and a reserved seat for the program.

For ticket information, call Olsen at (785) 741-0208, (785) 547-3508 or e-mail him at olegold@rainbowtel.net.

EQU | Equestrian has 2 home shows this weekend

The K-State equestrian team will play host to two Western Shows this weekend at Fox Creek Stables, both of which will be held on Saturday, February 25 starting at 8 a.m. The Wildcats will have 30 riders competing in the morning show and 31 riders competing in the afternoon show.

The Wildcats will be one of eight teams riding this weekend. They will be competing against Missouri State, Blackhawk College, Iowa State, Illinois State, Truman State, Northwest Missouri State and Southern Illinois.

In its last outing at Washington on Feb. 19, the Wildcats took first at the High Point Team with 42 points. Freshmen Dresden Sommer and senior Summer Hamil had strong performances, as they tied for Reserve High Point Rider for the day.

TEN | K-State defeats Tulsa, snaps 3-match loss streak

TULSA, Okla. — K-State snapped a three-match skid in which they lost the doubles point and Olga Klimova continued her recent success as the No. 66 Wildcat beat No. 72 Tulsa, 4-3, on Thursday at the Michael D. Case Tennis Center.

Klimova, who has won three straight singles and doubles matches, defeated Julie Westfall at No. 6 singles 7-5, 6-1, and teamed with Fernanda Da Valle to top Agostina Santoro and Tiffany Smith, 8-4, at No. 3 doubles.

Klimova and Da Valle's win at No. 3 helped the Wildcats (3-2, 0-1) earn the doubles point. The doubles point, awarded to the team who wins the best of three doubles match-ups, has proven elusive for the Wildcats early on this season.

Thursday's win at No. 2 and No. 3 marked just the second doubles point taken by the Wildcats in five tries this year and was the first doubles point win since a 7-0 season-opening victory against Drake.

In singles, Kansas State dropped matches to Tulsa (6-3) at both the No. 1 and No. 2 positions but showed their depth by winning three of the final four. Maria Perevoschikova defeated Thalia Diaz-Barriga at the No. 3 position in straight sets to improve her dual play record to a team-leading 4-1.

Baseball set for Mardi Gras Classic

By K. Jordan Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's Mardi Gras weekend, but Bourbon Street will not be the only reason people head to New Orleans this weekend.

The K-State baseball team (1-1) heads to Cajun country to play in the annual Mardi Gras Ball Baseball Classic this weekend in New Orleans, against Louisiana-Monroe (0-7), Purdue and host Louisiana-Lafayette (1-0).

Of the four teams competing, the Lafayette Ragin' Cajuns — who the Wildcats face at 2 p.m. Saturday — pose the greatest threat as an annual regional squad, having finished eighth nationally last year in batting average and 10th in scoring.

Despite the level of competition Lafayette brings, Coach Brad Hill said he sees it no differently than any other game.

"You need to disregard the stats. It doesn't matter who you play," he said.

"We need to take a good approach, be sharp, intense and capitalize on the momentum," Hill said. "Good swings are contagious."

Freshman Byron Wiley knows about good swings, since he leads the Big 12 Conference in hitting, on-base and slugging percentages. His performance has a lot to do with the players around him, he said.

"There's really not a lot of pressure," Wiley said. "The older guys on the team are proven leaders, and I learn from them. This is the Big 12 — it's what you live for."

The first round of the tournament will be at 2 p.m. today against Louisiana-Monroe with sophomore Chase Bayuk on the mound.

Sunday's game is against Purdue at 10:30 a.m. The Boilermakers return 7-of-9 starters, including a preseason All-American short stop. The ball will be in sophomore pitcher Brad Hutt's hands (1-0) when the Cats take on the Boilermakers in Purdue's season opener.

Senior Adam Cowart — last season's Big 12 earned run average leader — will face the potent offense of Lafayette on Saturday afternoon, but for Cowart, it's just another day.

"I feel good, and I've thrown well," Cowart said. "We're going to go out there with the same approach and play our game. Numbers don't matter."

K-State travels to Oklahoma Saturday knowing postseason fate is still uncertain

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State seems to have the disadvantage heading into Saturday's game against No. 22 Oklahoma in Norman, Okla.

The Wildcats (5-8 Big 12 Conference, 14-10) are coming off a 65-64 loss to No. 7 Texas on Wednesday, while the Sooners (9-4, 18-6) are entering the contest with a 71-70 victory against Texas Tech Monday.

K-State is 1-7 on the road, and Oklahoma has only lost once at home.

But not so fast. When K-State walks into Lloyd Noble Center on Saturday, they bear at least one advantage. The drop to Texas, while frustrating, might have prepared the Wildcats because Oklahoma's and Texas' style of play is nearly identical, Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"They're physical, they have excellent rebounding — they're pretty much a carbon copy," Wooldridge said of the two top-25 teams.

Rebounding is one of Oklahoma's strong points.

The Sooners are leading the Big 12 in rebounding defense (27.1) and rebounding margin (+10.9), mainly due to Oklahoma's big men, Taj Gray (8.1 per game) and Kevin Bookout (7.1 per game).

Grabbing boards was one thing the Wildcats were pleased with in their well-rounded game against Texas, junior Akeem Wright said.

"Our defense, getting rebounds and easy transition baskets," Wright said when asked about positives in the Texas loss.

Oklahoma's perimeter also warrants attention.

Michael Neal, a junior guard, paces the Big 12 in 3-pointers (3.55) and three-point percentage (44.3).

K-State's perimeter, on the other hand, is questionable right now. The Cats tallied only 23.5 percent from three-point range against Texas.

Junior Cartier Martin — one of K-State's top three-point shooters — had only five points on Wednesday's game and sophomore guard Clint Stewart is still questionable for Saturday because of an ankle injury.

Junior Lance Harris' status for Saturday also was uncertain Thursday after Harris was arrested twice Wednesday night for multiple parking violations.

Regardless of who shows up, K-State knows they are on the bubble for post-season play. Every win counts in February and every team in the Big 12 is doing what it can to make it to the post season, Texas coach Rick Barnes said in Wednesday's press conference.

For that reason, K-State was forced to think about the Sooners almost immediately after the Texas loss, sophomore David Hoskins said.

"Right now we're disappointed," Hoskins said Wednesday night. "But we've gotta look ahead to Oklahoma."

learning experience for the Wildcats.

"I think we learned just how tough the Big 12 can be," Gipson said. "We are playing another top-10 team, so we have another chance to be a really good team. We came closer together as a team and gave us a lot of confidence."

The Bears come off of an 86-40 victory against Colorado on Wednesday and are led by Naismith Trophy finalist, Wooden Award finalist and two-time Big 12 Player of the Week, Sophia Young.

Young, a senior, is second in the league in scoring (21 points per game) and third in rebounding, averaging 9.5 rebounds per game. Young also set the Big 12 rebounding record with two rebounds against the Buffaloes to improve her career total to 1,224 boards, and with 20 points against Colorado, Young moved to within 64 points of the conference

Wildcats face 2nd top-10 team in 4 days with Baylor Bears

The Wildcats finish the 2005-06 home schedule with No. 10 Baylor Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

For the Wildcats (17-8, 7-7), the 2005 Big 12 Conference Tournament championship game rematch with the Bears (20-5, 10-4) will be the second consecutive home game K-State will face an Associated Press Top-10 opponent.

On Tuesday, the Wildcats became the first K-State team since the 2000-01 squad to lose three-straight conference games with a 78-64 loss to No. 9 Oklahoma.

Coach Deb Patterson said the losing streak is not something the team worries about.

"It's a statistic that doesn't have a lot of validity for our basketball team or our staff because for us, it's about just simply the X's and O's, and the technical challenge and the emotional challenge of finding a way to compete and win the next game," Patterson said.

Jennings, Bentley take the stage at Bramlage

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thousands of people went to Bramlage Coliseum to see Dierks Bentley and Shooter Jennings perform Thursday evening.

The night began with the pre-concert party, as well as a chance for several people to meet and greet Bentley.

Eleven-year-old Courtney Case was one of those people. Her father accompanied her on the two-hour trip from Tescott, Kan., to see the concert. Case won an essay contest sponsored by a Salina, Kan., radio station. Her prize was a backstage pass to meet Bentley. She said he also autographed her backstage pass.

"I think it was cool to meet him because I've never met anybody famous," she said.

People continued to file in as the pre-concert party reached its end. Then it was time for Shooter Jennings to perform.

Jennings, son of the late Waylon Jennings, began his show with several songs from his second album, "Electric Rodeo," to be released April 4. He also featured songs originally recorded by his father, as well as some by other artists like David Allen Coe.

Brian Goad, senior in finance and Aly Kanning, senior in human resources cheer during the Shooter Jennings and Dierks Bentley concert.

Michelle Yoder, senior in elementary education, said she enjoyed Jennings' show.

"I liked how his band was like an old rock-type group," she said. "It's really cool that he's carrying on the legacy of his dad."

Stephen Gudis, tour manager for Jennings, said the K-State performance was the beginning of Jennings' and Bentley's five-city tour together.

Jennings is one of five new artists to open for Bentley during his five-week "Platinum and Porcelain" tour. From Manhattan, the two will travel to St. Joseph, Mo.

After a 30-minute intermission, Bentley took the stage.

He performed songs from both of his platinum albums, including "Settle for a Slowdown," "Come a Little Closer" and "My Last Name."

This was Bentley's first time headlining in Manhattan and he said he was pleased that a large number of people came.

Toward the end of his performance, Bentley and the four members of his band switched to Bluegrass-style instruments and played two songs.

Marva Morgan, freshman in business at K-State-Salina, said she is a fan of Bentley's music.

"I just heard about (the concert) today and just had to come see Dierks," she said.

Shawna Fuhrman, junior in architecture, said she was impressed with the setup of Bramlage Coliseum for the concert.

"I liked the way it was organized with not too many people on the floor," she said. "My friends and I were dancing and had a lot of fun."

Singing to a crowd of fans, Dierks Bentley entertains thousands of people Thursday evening at Bramlage Coliseum. Bentley performed songs such as "Settle for a Slowdown," "Come a Little Closer," and "My Last Name."

Professor transforms cloth into wearable works of art

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Clothing is not usually seen as art.

Sherry Haar, assistant professor of apparel textiles and interior, created "Wearable Art" for the William T. Kemper Art Gallery at the K-State Student Union.

The exhibit began Feb. 13 and will end today. The exhibit is textiles in the form of art.

Beth Bailey, program manager and assistant director for the Union, said the Union Program Council arts committee chooses the pieces that will be interesting to the students and community.

"We haven't done a lot of textiles in exhibits," she said, "but I think it was purposeful and beneficial to pursue the artist."

According to the artist's statement, Haar said her "goal was to transform a smooth and plain surface into one texture of color; and to transform two-dimensional cloth into a three-dimensional form appropriate for the body."

She described her methods in creating the color and image, texture and form of clothes. She said the "Transformations in Cloth" represented her recent explorations in cloth.

"I hope the exhibit causes you to pause and ponder, and perhaps feel a bit of joy that I find in working with textiles," according to the statement.

There were several pieces of clothing in the exhibit, and Haar described what each represented and how it was made. "Faces of Heart Disease," "Spirits of the Yei Sisters," and "Shaped Cloth I and II" were pieces on display.

Jessica Rittenhouse, sophomore in anthropology, said she was walking by when the exhibit caught her eye.

"I really enjoyed the message she was putting out," she said. "I loved looking at all the art and the different fabrics involved."

She saw a lot of different messages that the artist was trying to convey. She also enjoyed how descriptive she was in explaining her art and the depth she went to describe the process.

Rittenhouse said the "Faces of Heart Disease" was her favorite piece. The item was a red halter dress with faces of women who had survived heart disease in the area. The women were photographed and then hand-painted lightly onto the dress.

She said she would go to a larger show if the artist ever had one because it was so interesting.

"It was amazing to see her take something that we wear everyday and turn it into an artistic message," she said.

A piece titled "The Challenge, 2004," made of hand-dyed and commercial fabrics, beads and threads hangs on a wall in the William T. Kemper Art Gallery.

Silly romantic comedy doesn't live up to hype

TWENTIETH CENTURY FOX

"Date Movie"

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Movie review by Corbin H. Crable

If you're on a blind date and spontaneously decide you never want to see your companion again, take them to see "Date Movie." They'll never forgive you.

If you can last an hour and 30 minutes of this cinematic fiasco, you either have a very strong stomach or are a masochist. Like the "Scary Movie" trilogy before it, "Date Movie" takes every cliché and film reference in the genre of romantic comedies and assaults audience members with the dated references until the antics become too predictable to tolerate.

The movie's paper-thin storyline follows Julia Jones (Alyson Hannigan of the "American Pie" series), an overweight, homely-looking woman who longs to strike up a relationship with a man (Adam Campbell) she meets while working at her parents' Greek restaurant. After a little cosmetic overhaul, she gets her prince charming but must fend off his ex-girlfriend to keep him.

Tossed in with the parodies are cameo appearances that make no sense but might, with some frame of reference, be funny. Rapper Lil' Jon and actress/model Carmen Electra make brief appearances but are unable to save the film.

If you're a fan of parody movies, "Scary Movie 4" might be worth the admission price, but "Date Movie" deserves nothing less than a straight-to-video fate.

Rodeo Team members prepare for appearance

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The only opportunity of the year for people to see the K-State Rodeo Team perform on campus is this weekend.

The K-State Rodeo Team will perform at Weber Arena Friday through Sunday. Performances will be at 7:30 tonight and Saturday and 1 p.m. Saturday and Sunday.

Mark Maynard, junior in agricultural economics, said he has been a bull rider for K-State since spring 2004.

Maynard said one thing he likes about bull riding is that it is an extreme sport born in the United States, and it is one of the nation's fastest-growing sports.

The rodeo team participates in seven rodeos during the school year.

"It's cool to have a big crowd when you compete," Maynard said. "It pushes you to do better."

Maynard said Weber Arena is the best local venue for a rodeo, and students should come to support the team.

"You don't usually get a chance to see a rodeo," Maynard said. "Even if you don't know anything about it, there's a lot going on to draw you in."

"A crowd is more involved in a rodeo than in a lot of other sports."

Maynard said even though he will be there to ride, he also enjoys watching the other events.

"Every contestant's out there working wholeheartedly," Maynard said. "It's high-paced competition."

Leanne Thompson, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, is a contestant for the rodeo queen, Miss Rodeo K-State.

The winner will be announced at 6:45 p.m. before Saturday's performance. She said she is looking forward to the rodeo being on campus.

"You've got all your friends there to back you up," Thompson said. "We also know the arena, which is an advantage for us."

Rodeo Team coach Matt McKinstry, graduate student in animal science, said it's like any other sporting event at K-State.

"It's great to be in front of friends and family and KSU fans in general and adds to the level of competition and gives our team members added support and can take their level of performance up a notch or two," McKinstry said.

David McClure, assistant instructor of animal sciences and industry and horse unit manager/Rodeo Club adviser, said the students who participate in the rodeo work hard all year round.

"One thing people may not realize is the commitment these students have," McClure said.

McClure also said the excitement level is higher with a strong student turnout.

"This is the biggest college rodeo next to the college national finals, as far as attendance goes," McClure said.

McKinstry said the dedication it takes to be competitive in this sport is the most underrated aspect, something people do not realize about rodeo.

"Each individual at our rodeo this weekend will have spent countless hours in practice and travel time honing their skills and try to be the best they can be," McKinstry said. "Also, many people don't realize the number of rodeos that cowboys and cowgirls travel to throughout the year. Most of the competitors this weekend will be traveling to 50 rodeos or more throughout the year, throughout the United States."

There also will be a dance after the rodeos on Friday and Saturday nights at R.C. McGraw's, 2317 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

Tickets are available at the K-State Student Union Bookstore, Varney's, RB Outpost, 7003 Tuttle Creek Blvd., and Orscheln Farm and Home store, 530 McCall Road.

Tickets are $8 for adults, $3 for children and children six and younger are free.

A pass for the entire weekend is $15. Tickets also can be purchased at the door of the arena before the events.

If tickets are purchased at the door before the performance, they are $9 for adults and children 12 and younger are $3.

The teams' next rodeo will be March 3-5 in Garden City, Kan.

Schools travel to Manhattan for traditional competition

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Rodeo Club will be host to several schools from around the Midwest at the annual Western Show on Saturday and Sunday.

The draw of several schools to the area, along with the allure of seeing a regulation rodeo that will have events such as saddle bronco riding and bull riding, is going to bring in many spectators who want to see this weekend's events, K-State Rodeo Coach Matt McKinstry said.

"We're expecting over 10,000 spectators and over 500 competitors throughout the weekend," he said.

Twenty-one colleges and universities from Oklahoma, Missouri and Kansas will travel to Manhattan to compete in events, some of which include cattle roping, steer wrestling and barrel racing. Some of the schools in Kansas that will compete include Cloud County Community College, Fort Hays State University and Pratt Community College.

According to the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association, Southwestern Oklahoma State University, in Weatherford, Okla., leads in both the men's and women's team rankings of the Central Plains Region.

This region includes K-State and the other schools that travel to Manhattan to compete.

Garry Brower, rodeo coach and associate professor for the Department of Agriculture at Fort Hays State University, said many preparations go into traveling to another college or university to participate in the rodeos.

"We have a travel meeting to assign hotel rooms and hand out gas money to each vehicle," Brower said. "There are usually nine official trucks and trailers. We (arrive) at the rodeo a few hours ahead of time so the horses can rest before competing."

The NIRA maintains there are a certain number of rodeos that schools can go to each year.

"NIRA restricts us to 10 regulation rodeos each year," Brower said. "Outside of that, the current members probably go to over 100 rodeos throughout the entire year. Most of their summers and weekends are spent on the road, traveling from rodeo to rodeo."

Overall, the competitors said they enjoy being able to improve their skills and meet new people.

"(Before a rodeo), we practice quite a bit," Jacob Ritz, student director of the Central Plains Region and senior in technology leadership at Fort Hays University and Pratt Community College, said. "We encourage each other; that's the mental part. We all have a pretty good time, and that is what it is all about."

Brower said he agreed.

"I like watching development or improvement during practice sessions and in competitions," he said. "It's all about how (the competitors) feel when they do their best."

The K-State rodeo this weekend will have nine events, including bareback riding, breakaway roping, calf roping, goat tying, steer wrestling, saddle bronc riding, team roping, barrel racing and bull riding.

"Stock will begin at 10 a.m. Friday morning, with the performance beginning at 7:30 (p.m.)," said Lindsay Domer, freshman in agricultural communications and journalism and rodeo participant.

There will be a 1 p.m. stock on Saturday and a performance at 7:30 p.m. Also on Saturday, the K-State rodeo queen coronation will take place at 6:30 p.m. The finals are at 1 p.m. Sunday, with the top 15 riders performing in each event.

"The speed events are done on time, so there are no judges," said David McClure, Rodeo Club adviser and assistant instructor of animal science and industry. "Only the rough stock, which includes bareback riding and bronco riding, are actually judged."

In these events, there will be two judges whose scores are averaged. A rider can be awarded up to 50 points for both how the animal bucks and how the cowboy rides.

In horse events, judges look for good animal control, good spurring and how in-time with the animal the rider is. In bull riding, judges look for the rider to stay in control, as well as for disqualifications, such as using the free hand.

The main prize is a cash prize, which is determined by how many people compete, and how much money the Rodeo Club takes in.

Rodeo guidelines stress animal rights laws compliance

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Rodeo begins this weekend, and organizers said they believe harsh treatment of the animals is unacceptable.

Jim Rogers, spokesman for the United States Department of Agriculture's Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service, said the Animal Welfare Act doesn't apply to rodeos.

The law prevents harm of animals, including for research purposes, pet store displays and general animal care. Any person who does not give adequate "humane care" such as keeping up sanitation, ventilation and housing to an animal will be in violation of the law.

Even though APHIS doesn't cover rodeos, the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association, does specify guidelines for people to follow while participating in a rodeo with an animal.

Sarah Neely, director of public relations for the NIRA, said the association is similar to the NCAA in relation to sports.

She said rodeo students are respectful to the animals.

"These animals are the backbone of the sport," she said. "There is also a history of respect between cowboys and their animals that is still carried through today."

She said a lot of people keep their eyes out for inhumane treatment of the animals.

Judges are there to evaluate everything that happens in the arena. Both the judges and the coaches are there to make sure that everything keeps running smoothly.

"It is very important to keep the animals in a healthy state," she said. "We need them to compete, but they are animals that have a relationship with the people around them."

There are about 21 regulations that guarantee the safety of the animals, and if they are not followed, the violator might be subject to large fines, Neely said.

Matt McKinstry, graduate student in animal science and coach of the rodeo club, said they follow the regulations, and if a person is seen in violation of those regulations, they will be reported.

He said, for example, if a person is seen hitting a horse outside the context of correcting the animal, fines can start at $500 and continue into thousands of dollars.

Rodeo contractors can be suspended or have their contracts pulled.

McKinstry said it is not a problem at K-State.

Horses sit in a trailer in a parking lot north of Weber Arena last year during the rodeo.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

"No one wants a 3-year-old child asking why it (someone hitting an animal) is happening," he said. "This is a family atmosphere, and we want to set a good example for the community."

He said there is no use of electric cattle prods because they could be used to hurt or intimidate the animal.

"We pretty much treat our animals like we would want to be treated," he said. "This should be a fun, family environment."

Competitor overcomes injury to reach goals

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wild horses couldn't keep Lindsay Domer away from K-State's rodeo this weekend.

In fact, that's why she's here.

Lindsay, a freshman in agricultural communications and journalism, is a first-year KSU Rodeo Club member. However, the rodeo experience is nothing new to her, as she is a third-generation participant.

"Since the day I was born, I've loved rodeos," Lindsay said. "My mom, dad and uncle were all on the rodeo team at K-State."

Marilyn Domer, Lindsay's mother, said Lindsay has been involved with rodeos since she was two.

"All of my memories regarding her and rodeos are great, and there's been a lot," Marilyn said. "We've had a lot of traveling time in the truck, a lot of windshield time."

Lindsay owns a 6-year-old quarter-horse gelding, Shaq, that she has had for two years and uses in competition.

However, recent complications could hinder Lindsay's performance this weekend.

While practicing in preparation for the event, a small accident caused her to chip a bone in her foot, she said, causing discomfort and worry.

"I had to get a doctor's release for my goat-tying event Saturday night," Lindsay said. "It makes it considerably difficult to rope, since I have to put weight on my foot when I stand up on my horse."

Yet the show must go on. While not participating in the goat-tying, Lindsay will still compete in breakaway roping, which she describes as the female version of calf-roping.

"She tries so hard and is so dedicated," Marilyn said.

Extensive experience is one reason Lindsay is able to push past her pain, she said. While in high school, she competed in the Kansas High School Rodeo Association. Lindsay described the experience as being "more of a family organization, with all of the parents helping other kids."

While participating, Lindsay traveled to schools in Kansas and Oklahoma. She also competed in the International Finals Youth Rodeo in Shawnee, Okla., for three summers, she said.

The list of reasons Lindsay loves rodeos is a long one, but she summed it up in one reason.

"I love how in this sport you're friends with the competition; there's not really any rivalry," Lindsay said. "The college rodeo experience has been different than anything else I've done."

Lindsay said her foot injury is the top of the list of her rodeo dislikes at the moment, but she said she also worries about the amount of school being a team member causes her to miss.

"We usually leave Wednesday afternoon, and are gone the rest of the week," Lindsay said. "(The Student Governing Association) gives us some money for fuel and motels, and the club raises the rest. We drive our own trucks and trailers but usually carpool with other members."

As the rodeo gets closer, Lindsay paused to think about her hard work and preparation.

"I feel ready," Lindsay said. "I started practicing the second week of school, and every day since."

She visits the Peters Recreation Complex for one and a half hours, five days a week and goes to two scheduled practices a week, she said.

In addition, she travels to a barn in Riley, Kan., where her horse is stabled.

"My horse and I are a team," Lindsay said. "In order for me to do well, he has to do well. I need to pay attention to every detail he gives me. I probably take better care of my horse than I do myself. You build a bond with your horse not while roping calves in Weber Hall but by riding him in a pasture and brushing and feeding him."

Lindsay said she also has concerns about the public's occasional negative response to her sport.

Growing up in Topeka, she said she has dealt with many negative reactions.

"I can't stress enough how well the animals are taken care of," Lindsay said. "My horse comes running when he sees me. We respect each other — we're partners."

She also said the livestock used in rodeos are treated under strict rules issued by the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association (NIRA). It is never in anyone's best interests to harm an animal, Lindsay said.

"There are fines if you harm an animal," she said. "Also, most people in rodeos make their living off raising livestock, so they're losing a profit by injuring one. Plus, you can't compete to your best level."

Lindsay is looking forward to a packed arena in Weber Hall.

"Everybody gets nervous; they're lying if they say otherwise," Lindsay said. "You have to use the nervousness and adrenaline to get you excited. I think it makes me compete better."

ANNUAL | Sport's popularity has grown over the past few years ago, Frazier said. The time improvement is because athletes aren't competing in multiple events like they used to, he said.

Lucas Haag, former president of the K-State Rodeo Club and graduate in agronomy, said it has been interesting to see how the popularity of the sport has changed over time.

"In the last several years there has been more media attention on the sport of rodeo, especially on the sport of bull riding," Haag said.

Attendance at the K-State Rodeo has reflected this trend, he said.

"It's generally one of those events the students have always supported well," Haag said.

The K-State Rodeo is the longest-running college rodeo in the United States, and it is an event that students from other universities look forward to competing at, Frazier said.

"Kids from other schools always said, 'If you have one place to go, go to K-State's rodeo,'" he said.

In 1947, K-State had its first rodeo, but between then and 1956, a few years slipped by without the event, Haag said.

Before it moved to Weber Hall in the 1980s, the rodeo took place in Ahearn Field House, Frazier said.

To honor its 50th-straight year, a brief history of the rodeo will be read before each event, Haag said.

Old-school games like Tecmo Bowl offer superior play

You could say I'm old school when it comes to video games.

The only video game system I own is an original eight-bit Nintendo, which my wife gave me about three years ago.

I can't say this particular act of kindness was the reason I asked her to marry me, but it was still a great Christmas present.

I like original Nintendo because of its simplicity. The controllers are as simple as directions on a can of soup. It was a perfect match — a simple system for a simple-minded guy.

For sports fans like me, the best video games are sports games.

There have been a number of great sports video games — Tiger Woods' PGA Tour, Madden NFL Football, Mike Tyson's Punch-Out!! and NBA Jam, to name a few.

But none quite measure up to original Nintendo's Tecmo Super Bowl.

Here are some reasons Tecmo Super Bowl is the best sports video game ever:

- Running back Bo Jackson has a good chance to score on any given play, even if the Los Angeles Raiders are facing fourth-and-27 from their own 1-yard line.

- QB Eagles, who surprisingly resembles Randall Cunningham, torches opposing defenses with his arm or legs.

- It is uncommon for San Francisco quarterback Joe Montana to throw for less than 350 yards and five touchdowns with 70-percent accuracy in a game.

- Speaking of San Francisco, wide receiver Jerry Rice regularly makes diving catches in triple coverage.

- Kansas City linebacker Derrick Thomas might finish a season with 35 sacks and still place fourth behind Buffalo's Bruce Smith, Philadelphia's Reggie White and New York Giants' Lawrence Taylor.

- Defenders bounce off Kansas City running back Christian Okoye like they are scared to tackle him.

- The game's creators realized taking a knee on kickoff returns is incredibly wimpy, so they forced returners to run the ball out.

- To counteract the ease of earning first downs, punters have crazy-strong legs.

- To keep scores somewhat reasonable, defenses are generally much faster than offenses, except for Bo Jackson.

- Lawrence Taylor can blitz a quarterback and recover in time to stop a running back for a 2-yard gain.

- The clock runs so fast you can play at least three games in the time it takes for your roommate to return from Ballroom Dancing class.

- You can't miss extra points unless they are blocked.

- You have about a 30-percent chance of recovering an onside kick.

- Defenders can dive about four yards, but they are limited to cardinal and intermediate directions, and they often dive a yard too early.

- The music repeats about every eight seconds, but for some reason, it never gets old.

- The referee doesn't talk during the coin toss. He just makes sickly dolphin noises.

- On any given play, a defense's front seven might storm the line of scrimmage.

- It was the first Nintendo football game to offer full-season play with real NFL players, complete stat-tracking, player subs and even injuries.

Tennis returns home for WSU

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team can take comfort in returning to familiar territory, in their first home outing in nearly a month with Saturday's duel match against Wichita State at Ahearn Fieldhouse.

The anticipation of playing in front of some friendly faces is exciting for sophomore Tamar Kvaratskhelia. A home crowd provides energy, motivating her to elevate her game, she said.

"I play better in front of people (I know) because I feel support from them when they cheer for me," Kvaratskhelia said. "You look up and everyone is smiling and clapping, and then you want to play 110 percent."

Kvaratskhelia said she hopes she and her teammates can shed a positive light on tennis for people who have never experienced tennis up close.

"A lot of people have never seen tennis, so we want their first experience to be good," Kvaratskhelia said. "We want people to think tennis is exciting."

Wichita State, who has not defeated K-State in a duel match since 1993, will attempt to overcome that crowd with the addition of Madina Rakhim, who transferred to WSU in January.

Rakhim, ranked No. 47 nationally, is 6-0 as the Shockers' No. 1 singles player, recently defeating Arkansas' No. 43-ranked Ela Kaluder.

While individual achievements are rewarding, there still aren't many individuals who can win a team match single-handedly, which is why Coach Steve Bietau will not lose sleep deciding who he will place against Rakhim, he said.

"Our lineup, as usual, is not a big concern for me," Bietau said. "A team match is about winning four points. It's not about who has the best player, but who has the best six players and, more importantly, which six play the best on that day."

Instead, the Wildcats have spent much of the week preparing for what they need to do mentally. Being able to formulate a plan and thinking ahead have been stressed all week during practice, assistant coach Marcos Mendez said.

"We have been working on tactics and having a plan and following it," Mendez said. "If plan A does not work, then you want to have a plan B or C."

Saturday's match with the Shockers wraps up an eight-day span that saw K-State play four teams in three states. The experience has been educational, freshman Katerina Kudlackova said.

"It's crazy, but I like it," Kudlackova said. "I can look at my mistakes more and improve."

Author to speak at Manhattan Public Library

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kent Haruf, author of "Plainsong," will speak at 2 p.m. Sunday at the Manhattan Public Library, 629 Poyntz Ave.

Manhattan Public Library Reference Manager Susan Withee said Haruf will speak as part of the One Book, One Community Program.

"He said he will talk about how the writing process goes and may read a book as part of the presentation," Withee said.

Haruf, who lives in eastern Colorado, was easily convinced to come speak, Withee said.

"We wrote him and requested that he come," she said. "We told him we liked his book, and he told us he would be able to visit."

Haruf's most popular novel, "Plainsong," was published in 1999.

It received the Mountains and Plains Booksellers Award and was the finalist for the National Book Award, the Los Angeles Times Book Prize and the New Yorker Book Award.

Haruf studied literature at Nebraska Wesleyan University in Lincoln.

According to the Random House, Inc. Web site, "Plainsong" tells the story of Tom Guthrie, a high school teacher who raises his two sons after his wife moves to her sister's house, following a bout of depression. The book revolves around the two sons and how they deal with their mother's abandonment of them. The book also covers several other adult themes, including teen pregnancy and aging.

Joann Hettenbach, print media specialist at Manhattan High School West Campus, said the author is well-known by students.

"A number of our students have read the books," she said.

"A number of the (Advanced Placement) English students are reading it as part of one of their projects."

Haruf will speak Monday at Manhattan High School. Hettenbach said most students are anticipating the visit.

Haruf also will speak at 4 p.m. Monday in the Big 12 Room at the K-State Student Union.

Withee said she hopes Haruf will speak about the overall experience of writing.

"I hope he'll talk about what his writing process is like," she said. "Things like where he got his ideas for the book and what his other books have been like would be interesting too."

Randy Martin, Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board president, said he is pleased that Haruf is coming to Manhattan.

"It's a good choice for someone to come and read," Martin said. "Anytime authors and people who are helping to create literature come to Manhattan, I think it's a great thing."

FREE BOOKS | Site allows for readers to network, exchange texts with others online

According to BookCrossing.com, Australia has 2,675 books in the wild, Spain has 1,258 and Germany has 3,424.

"The site boasts 3 million books released and has turned into an international phenomenon, with an effort to make the world one, big library," Mehra-Pederson said.

It has yet to spread to Manhattan, but there are 200 books in the wild in Kansas.

Austin Jonas, junior in mechanical engineering, said he thinks the Manhattan community should join BookCrossing.

"It sounds like a neat idea," Jonas said. "You'd get more of a variety of books. It's something exciting to do. I think it would be fun to share books to see how other people like or understand the book."

"Since it's a heavy college campus, it's more diverse," Jonas added. "There'd be more people open to this. There are a lot of different perspectives."

Laura Cochran, freshman in environmental design and employee at The Dusty Bookshelf, also said she thinks the Manhattan community would benefit from BookCrossing and disagreed with the concern that it would have a negative effect on book store business.

"It's neat books are going around in any way," Cochran said. "The more you get out there, the more excitement it brings."

Cochran said she would like The Dusty Bookshelf to be a place designated for books to be released and picked up.

"I think it would be a good thing that would bring people into the store," Cochran said.

Robin Slicer, 29, has been a member of BookCrossing for about two and a half years. She is a stay-at-home mom and goes to school part-time in Olathe, Kan. Slicer heard about BookCrossing.com from a friend.

"At that point, every job I had ever had was in a book store," Slicer said.

She said she is part of a group of BookCrossers who get together once a month to talk about books they have read and discuss where they will release the books.

"I have met some of my dearest online friends through BookCrossing," Slicer said. "It has become more than just about the book. It's a community of people who really care about each other."

Slicer has released 698 books into the wild. She said one of her favorite BookCrossing memories was when someone in New Zealand made a journal entry on a book she had released a year before.

"You're taking a chance putting a book out there," Slicer said. "It's worth waiting for because you get really cool stories. You just have to stick to it, and then you'll find some great results. It's fun to see the progression online of how each book travels."

According to the Web site, there are "3 R's" of BookCrossing: Read, Register and Release.

A book can be registered by going to BookCrossing.com and entering the ISBN number of the book and getting a BCID, written inside the book along with the Web site address.

When people find a book, they can log on to the Web site and enter the BCID to make a journal entry. A notification will then be sent to the person who registered the book.

Immediately after registering to become a member of BookCrossing.com, an e-mail is sent to the new member with instructions on how to get started.

The Welcome Kit concludes with a quote by Henry Miller from "The Books in My Life":

"A book is not only a friend, it makes friends for you. When you have possessed a book with mind and spirit, you are enriched. But when you pass it on you are enriched threefold."

all year. She is explosive, she is an incredible competitor and she is as good as they get for an undersized post player. She is one of my favorite players I've ever seen play in the women's game."

As a team, Baylor leads the Big 12 in scoring margin at +16.6, is second in scoring (76 ppg), is allowing 59.5 ppg and has won four of its last five games.

Along with the Wildcats playing in their final home game of the season, senior Jessica McFarland will play in front of the home crowd for the last time.

Junior Claire Coggins said McFarland's last game adds to the importance of Saturday's contest.

"It's always big to get a win at home, but it's J-Mac's (Jessica McFarland) last game, and we all know she really wants to win, and we want to win it for her and for ourselves," Coggins said. "We want to shock the conference."

Her team knows exactly where they stand, Patterson said.

"I think that this team understands that we are young, and we're playing quality basketball," Patterson said. "We're making some mistakes down the stretch that separate us from the teams that are beating us, but we feel good about who we are."

Pair spends nearly twice as much as closest rival

Elections '06

Voting for SGA primary elections begins Feb. 28 and ends March 1. Vote at sgaelections.k-state.edu.

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The top spending presidential candidate duo spent about twice as much on its campaign as the next pair.

Candidate pair Matt King and Emily Besler were the top spenders with $3,050.36. They were followed by Zach Hauser and Erica Boatman with $1,331.40.

King and Besler also had the most personal contributions with $777.

Candidates are not allowed to have more than $800 in personal contributions for their campaign.

Elections Commissioner Tanner Banion said personal contributions include money candidates themselves put into their campaign, special discounts they get from businesses that were not offered to other candidates and any donations from someone who is not a K-State student.

Most campaign money is spent on T-shirts and posters, Banion said.

Campaign spending does not always correlate to how well a pair does in the primaries, Banion said.

"Pairs may have a slight advantage if they can get their name out on campus," he said. "Some campaigns

Out-of-state students try for residency

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After attending K-State in fall 2005, LeAnne Moffett moved back to Texas, a state she hadn't lived in for three and a half years.

Moffett, originally from Dallas, is a junior in mathematics and economics at the University of Texas at Tyler because she said the quality of education at K-State was not worth the nearly $8,000 per semester she paid in out-of-state tuition.

To pay $300 less per credit hour in tuition, out-of-state students must prove or establish residency in Kansas.

"Residency requirements basically go by where the parents reside," Larry Moeder, director of admissions, said.

Moffett's parents live in Texas and pay Texas taxes, she said. Since she was still a dependent of her parents, the university classified Moffett as an out-of-state student, despite her Kansas high school and associate's degrees.

Moffett attended Butler County Community College, where she was considered an in-state student, she said, after graduating from high school in Kingman, Kan.

"The community college could recognize me as in-state, but K-State couldn't," she said.

"We just didn't understand because I had a Kansas driver's license,

High endurance

Cowboy recounts bull riding experience

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The bull snorts and paws at the ground as the cowboy sits on the animal's massive shoulders, hand tucked securely under a braided rope.

Sitting upright as the bull knocks against the bucking chute, the cowboy readies himself for the next eight seconds.

The chute suddenly is opened, and the crowd cheers as the cowboy lifts his hand high in the air, rising and falling with the bucking animal. The announcer shouts into the microphone, urging the cowboy on. The buzzer finally sounds, and the cowboy slides from the animal's back and jogs to the fence.

After removing his chaps and vest behind the bucking chutes, Dakota Base, senior in chemical engineering, climbs up to the arena seats, brushing dirt from his jeans and adjusting his black cowboy hat.

A member of K-State's Rodeo Team and a competitor in the bull riding event at the K-State Rodeo, Base has a passion for riding that courses through his veins. After Base sits down, he begins to reflect on his ride.

"I wasn't sitting well on it at all," Base said, still breathing heavily from his ride. "I've ridden a lot of these bulls before."

Base said his uncle provided most the bulls used for the bull riding competition at the K-State Rodeo.

Base begins to tell about his riding technique and what he thinks about when he rides.

While he talks, Base begins to describe taking cues from the bull's stance and movement.

"Bull riding is all about the shoulders," Base said. "Good bull riding is seeing what you need to see and keeping up with him. You get there before he does."

Base said a lot of riders try to be the animal and begin to think about how the animal thinks instead of focusing on how to ride the bull.

"It's not about beating the 2,000-pound animal," he said. "It's about beating the 160-pound animal riding the 2,000-pound animal."

Dakota Base, senior in chemical engineering, rides during the championship round Sunday afternoon. Base got a no score when he was bucked off the bull shortly after leaving the gate.

Roberts addresses Chamber

Speaking at the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce's annual meeting, Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., delivers the keynote address. This year's meeting theme was "Patriotism in the Little Apple."

Citizens in the United States are in danger of becoming complacent in the war on terrorism, Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., told the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce on Friday night.

"I am concerned some are becoming post-9/11 complacent," Roberts said.

Roberts was the keynote speaker at the annual meeting of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce at the K-State Alumni Center.

The theme of this year's meeting was "Patriotism in the Little Apple," and several groups, including the Chamber of Commerce, the Manhattan Convention and Visitors Bureau and the Flint Hills Job Corps Center, attended.

Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, welcomed attendees to the 81st meeting of the chamber.

"Tonight we're here to celebrate the patriotism of our community," Butler said. "We're welcoming back soldiers from Iraq and Afghanistan and their families and celebrating the return of the Big Red One."

The a cappella group Cadence, part of the K-State Men's Varsity Glee Club, performed the national anthem, and the prayer was offered by Col. Kenneth Sampson from Fort Riley.

Also in attendance were members of the Junction City Chamber of Commerce; Rep. Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan; Rep. Tom Hawk, D-Manhattan; and Sen. Roger Reitz, R-Manhattan.

Larry Heyka, past chair of the chamber, introduced Roberts.

"Pat has been very influential in our BRAC (Base Realignment and Closure) efforts and bringing the Big Red One back to Kansas," Heyka said.

Roberts spoke about K-State's contributions to national security, including the National Agricultural Biosecurity Center.

The center received $1.3 million from the Department of Defense, and this adds up to a $6 million investment by the U.S. Government, Roberts said.

Roberts said the security of the country depends on the military, and emphasized Fort Riley's contributions.

"Our military is unparalleled due to the training received at Fort Riley,

Iraqi attacks

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Bomb blasts and gunfire killed at least 27 people, including two U.S. soldiers, in Baghdad and nearby towns Sunday as an emergency daylight curfew was lifted in three provinces following the bombing of a Shiite shrine and a wave of retribution against Sunnis. Authorities reported no progress in the hunt for kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll.

Mardi Gras

NEW ORLEANS — The weather was sunny and mild Sunday as revelers in this fun-starved city gathered for a day-long extravaganza of Carnival season parades. The two big processions ordinarily are held on separate days in the big pre-Mardi Gras weekend, but a threat of thunderstorms on Saturday prompted the Krewe of Endymion to postpone its parade by a day.

Turin says goodbye

TURIN, Italy — Turin found a fitting way to bid arrivederci to the Winter Games. The athletes were issued red clown noses to wear Sunday night as they swarmed across the huge stage of Olympic Stadium, while the 35,000 spectators donned devil and angel masks in a closing ceremony doubling as Carnevale — the annual festival celebrated across Italy this weekend.

TOPEKA — Invitations to a fundraising event for Attorney General Phill Kline apparently went to some lobbyists, despite a state law prohibiting such solicitations while the Kansas Legislature is in session. Kline's office disclosed Feb. 20. Spokesman Whitney Watson said the incident resulted from an "honest mistake" by a consulting firm handling the mailing of invitations.

Cohen fell twice and finished with a silver; Slutskaia fell once and took bronze.

Miss Rodeo queen

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Meredith Holland, junior in public relations and women's studies, waves to the crowd at Weber Arena after being crowned Miss Rodeo K-State just before Saturday evening's rodeo events.

Junior crowned after beating out 4 competitors

By Austin Meeks
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When a new Miss America dons the sash, "There She Is" plays in the background. It was only fitting that a country tune played when Meredith Holland was crowned Miss Rodeo K-State.

Holland, junior in public relations and women's studies, was crowned at Weber Arena before Saturday's rodeo.

Holland said she has competed in rodeo pageants for several years, and the fact that she won at the K-State Rodeo made her victory even sweeter.

"I love that I won here because I love K-State so much," Holland said.

Holland was one of four students competing for the title of rodeo queen. The other contestants were Courtney Shanholtzer, junior in agricultural journalism and communications; Leanne Thompson, sophomore in animal science and industry; and Karrie Brashear, senior in animal science and industry.

The contestants were judged on horsemanship, congeniality and interview skills. They also took a written test, gave a speech and modeled country western clothing.

Thompson, who won the modeling portion of the competition, said she enjoyed competing in the various events.

"I'm on the equestrian team, so I felt pretty good about (the horsemanship event)," Thompson said. "The modeling is kind of fun because you get to strut your stuff."

The competition took place Feb. 17 and 18.

Holland said the week between the competition and the ceremony provided plenty of opportunities for second-guessing.

"It's absolutely nerve-wracking," Holland said.

"You run everything over in your head and think about what you could have done differently."

For Holland, the anxiety reached its peak as the contestants walked into Weber Arena for the ceremony, she said.

"I was definitely nervous," Holland said. "I was shaking. When they called my name, I was just excited and relieved."

K-State Rodeo judges bring experience, consistency

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While crowds might have been watching the antics and excitement of students performing at the K-State Rodeo this weekend, two sets of eyes were watching for more than just good rides and thrilling moments.

Those sets of eyes belonged to two men who determined who left the arena with high scores or hung heads.

This year's K-State Rodeo judges, Sam Minnick, of Leon, Kan., and Kelly Corbin, of Pawhuska, Okla., have a history of consistent involvement with rodeo competition in Kansas and surrounding states.

Minnick and Corbin have judged collegiate and professional rodeo competitions across Kansas and the Midwest.

Minnick and Corbin have about 35 years of judging experience between them. Minnick has judged for 15 years, while Corbin has judged for 20 years.

Corbin said he began competing in rodeos at a young age, encouraged by his parents.

Minnick said his interest in rodeo began as a sport, but after he stopped competing he still wanted to be involved.

Spending the weekend at the K-State Rodeo was a highlight, Minnick said.

"We've really enjoyed coming," he said.

As the only judges for the rodeo, Minnick and Corbin judged all rough stock and timed events. Corbin said he thought stock events, including bull riding, bronc riding and saddle-bronc riding, were the hardest to judge because he has less experience in those events.

"It's the hardest because it's the hardest to relate to," he said.

Conversely, Minnick said he grew up with rough stock events and had to work hard to learn how to judge timed events. To become a better judge, Minnick and Corbin said experience is the best teacher.

"Talk to people who are experienced and benefit from their experiences," Corbin said.

For aspiring young rodeo athletes, Corbin said following the example of another cowboy is a good start to a road to success.

"Find a good role model," Corbin said.

Matt McKinstry, graduate student in animal science and K-State's Rodeo Club coach, said Minnick and Corbin have been judging the K-State Rodeo for several years and offer fair and honest judging for the event.

"They're two of the best in the business," McKinstry said.

McKinstry said both men apply consistency and experience when scoring and judging events.

"When they turn in their individual scores, they're about one or two points off each other," McKinstry said. "As far as the team goes, having them here brings a level of professionalism."

TO THE POINT State needs way to establish residency

Since K-State operates with the help of state taxes, it is important for out-of-state students to pay a little extra. It simply would not be fair for a student to pay lower taxes in another state, and then come here to benefit from the taxes we pay.

However, with many universities receiving these tax dollars, the criteria they must meet to qualify for in-state tuition should not vary from one university to another.

It simply makes no sense that one college receiving Kansas tax dollars can call a student in-state, while another charges out-of-state fees to a student with the same circumstances.

The Kansas Board of Regents could fix this problem by setting its own regulations and getting all Kansas colleges to comply. Ideas, such as a Kansas high school diploma constituting residency, could become concrete with some effort.

Getting state universities to agree with this plan shouldn't be a problem since people depend on them to hand out tax money. It also would help to allow a group with an overall view of our state to decide how long a student should have to pay taxes to be considered a resident.

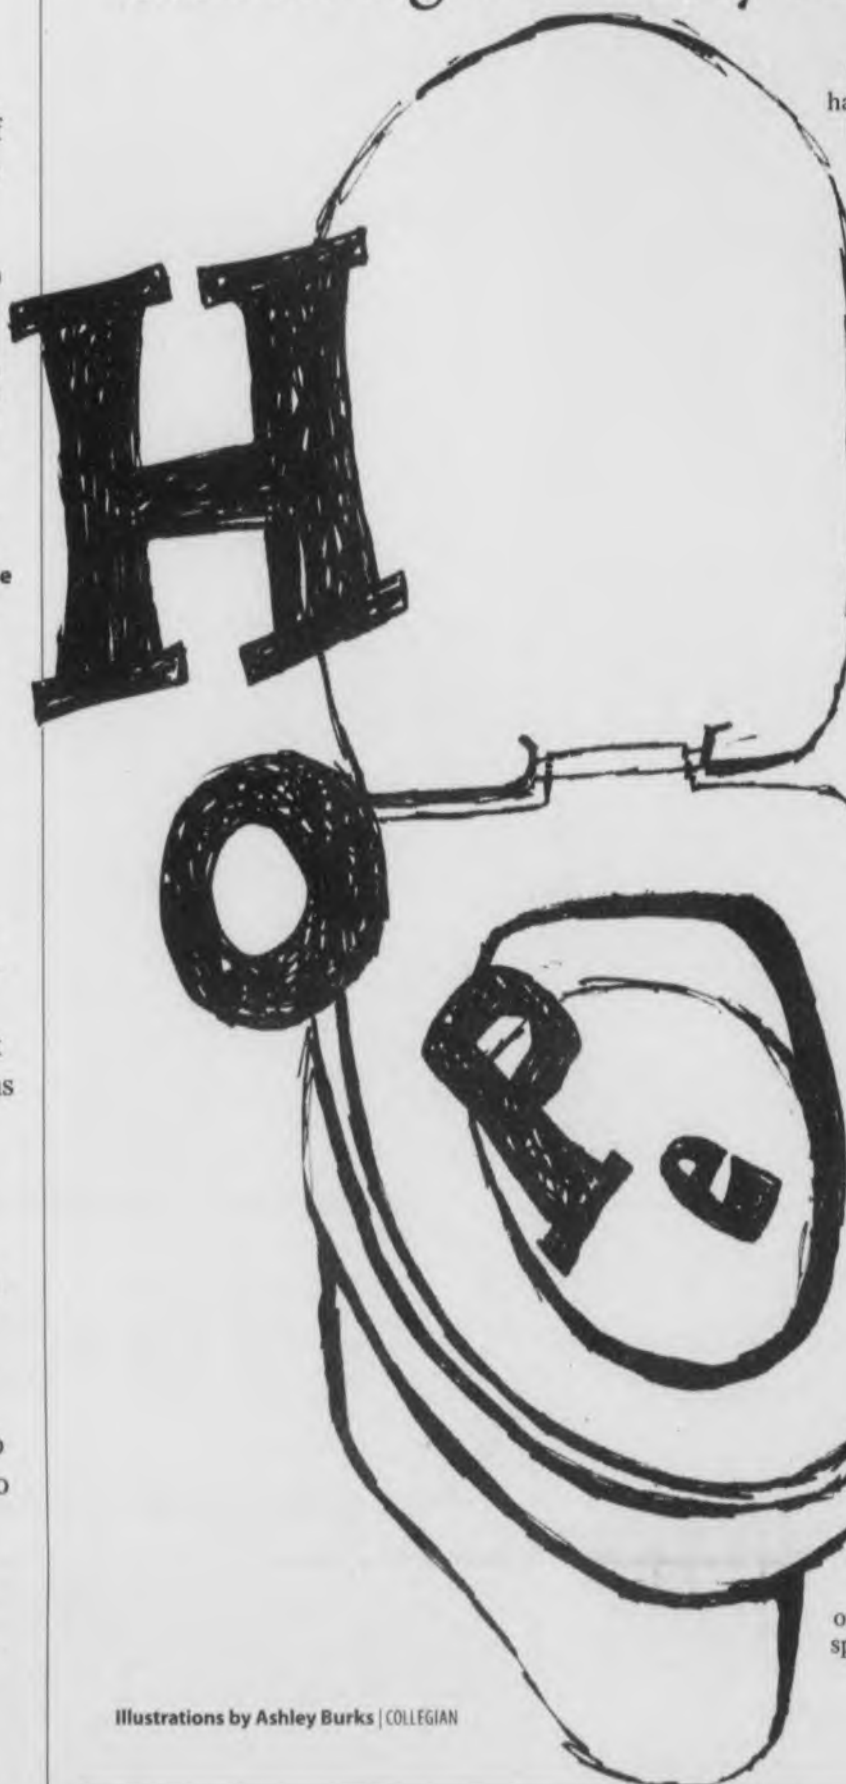

A move like this could spread across the nation, allowing easily-understood regulations to cover all state universities. There would be no question as to how long a student would need to live and work in a state before the student had proven they were committed to the state.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Dashed hopes

Students grow weary of monotonous routine

Illustrations by Ashley Burks | COLLEGIAN

The semester is nearing its halfway point, and something has to give.

The newness of a fresh semester has expired and the monotony of knowing has begun. What do I mean by "knowing"?

Let me explain. When the semester starts, we all have the same hopes.

One hope is in having professors who speak English so we can understand them or at least ones who will admit it when they don't. They could slow down and speak up or at least write more and better notes.

I know this is a crazy notion, but maybe they could even practice English so they can do the job we pay them to do: make us understand.

Are we asking too much?

I'm in Spanish 165, basically the lowest level Spanish course, and I am expected to speak the language better than some professors speak English.

These professors of whom I speak are worth their weight in gold for the knowledge they possess, and I respect them for that, but speak to me in a language I can understand.

We're several weeks into the semester, and we know that hope has been shattered. For the next hope I can only speak from a male perspective.

The cacophony of an alarm clock cannot trump the excitement at the thought of a new look at the ladies.

We get up on that first morning of class and wonder to ourselves who's going to be available. Moreover, which type do we even want? (Forgive my generalizations.)

Do we want a nice girl we can bring home to Mom? Do we even have the mental faculties to deal with such a complex creature? It takes at least a lifetime, I'm afraid.

Nah, not this semester.

OK then, maybe a party girl? They've been fun, in my experience. They're in college, and they act like it, and there isn't anything wrong with that. For some guys, it is everything right.

The decision is too difficult so we wait until we get through all of our classes and see. Of course it's a moot point by now because we know they're not interested in us anyway.

Another hope lost.

Lastly, we all started the semester just like every one before it: we were going to do things right. We were going to go to the gym every day.

That one is always obvious because it is impossible to find a parking spot at the Rec post new year's resolutions.

We were going to do every reading assignment for every class every time.

We were all going to be less selfish, keep a clean apartment, eat right, and a million other good thoughts.

But we all knew that wasn't going to happen, and now we know we were right.

So how do we fix this monotony of knowing?

Ask; I haven't figured it out yet.

Daniel Kirksey is a sophomore in English literature and philosophy. Please send your comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Stress build-up can be avoided with easy tasks

Stress. It's a word that has so much meaning to college students.

Stress sometimes leads to breakdowns. And a breakdown is what I had last Tuesday.

I had a major project due and everything that could go wrong, did. So, I cried - like a baby. Fortunately, I was able to get everything done and turned in on time, but my nerves have remained a little frazzled since my breakdown.

While I was so stressed out, it made me think "what could I have done better so that this would not have happened?"

It occurred to me that my fellow students would benefit from hearing some advice, too.

There is always the possibility of moving to a foreign country and enjoying its leisurely lifestyle, and there is always the advice your mom gave you about starting projects early.

I assume we are all staying in Kansas to finish school, we don't really have the money to buy a burger, let alone a ticket to a foreign country, and we can't really follow the advice our mom gave us because when we get new projects, we are still trying to finish the ones our teachers assigned us last week. So, I am turning to real, health professional advice.

The American Institute of Stress says stress is the number one health problem among Americans. Stress has physical and emotional effects on people, causing sickness and breakdowns. So, what can we do to make our lives less stressful?

The Web site campus-blues.com offers some great tips on how to help you stop stress before it starts and after it has begun, because, let's face it, this is college, and stress is coming.

■ Exercise. Psychological stress is linked to our physical health, therefore, exercise helps. This also helps so little stressors, like not being able to find a parking spot, don't build up and cause a huge breakdown.

■ Manage your time. Develop a schedule and follow it. I think writing lists every day helps, too. That way you know where you stand and where you can stop and have some fun.

■ Give yourself 20 minutes of "alone time" each day.

■ Don't sweat the small stuff. We've all heard it and sometimes it isn't possible to just chill out and not worry that you only have five minutes to get to your next class and it is 10 minutes away. You can be late one day. Give yourself a break!

■ Talk to people. Fume about how a teacher is killing you with assignments, and then forget about it. It helps. Everyone needs someone to just listen.

■ Laugh. A lot. This is my favorite one. It helps your mood and stress levels.

I've also been told by numerous people, "It will be OK" Be honest, just because you don't get that internship, that A-plus on a test, your life will not end. I mean, really, think about it.

I had to really evaluate life last Tuesday. I was pretty angry and upset, and I wanted to hurt my teacher, but I made it. I think it worked out for the best because my friends made me stop for a second, even when I thought I didn't have a second to stop. Life will be OK. We will all make it. I'll see you all at the finish line.

Only 2 pairs file for Salina elections; no primary this year

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State-Salina Elections chair Andrew Wilber said K-State-Salina will not have a primary election since only two pairs filed to run for student body president and vice president.

However, K-State-Salina students will be allowed to vote in primary elections for the main campus, he said.

Write-in candidates for student body president and vice president will not be allowed in general elections, he said.

Elections '06

Voting for SGA general elections will be March 7-8. Vote at sgaelections.k-state.edu.

RICHARDSON/MIKOLS

Lauren Richardson and Robin Mikols are running on a three-issue platform of atmosphere, alliance and activities.

Richardson, sophomore in professional pilot, said her leadership experiences include Ambassadors and two years in Student Governing Association.

Mikols said her leadership experiences include roles as president of Women in Aviation, Ambassadors, Association of Residence Halls and Judicial Board.

Richardson said in terms of atmosphere, she and Mikols want to change the image that K-State-Salina is a community college.

With alliance, Richardson said she hopes to link K-State-Salina to the Manhattan campus.

"A lot of Manhattan students have no idea that we exist," she said.

Lastly, Richardson said she and Mikols hope for better promotion of activities at K-State-Salina's campus.

"We've had a lot of complaints that there are no activities at Salina or on campus," Richardson said. "I think there are a lot of activities, but they just aren't promoted that much."

MITCHEM/PENNER

Also running for president and vice president are Jacob Mitchem and Robert Penner, respectively.

Mitchem, junior in aeronautical technology-professional pilot, said he and Penner are running on a platform of strengthening Manhattan and K-State-Salina campus relations.

Mitchem said a gap exists between students on both campuses.

They need knowledge of one another.

Mitchem said his leadership experiences include roles as Pilot Senator in Student Governing Association and a founding member of Club Airborne and membership in several committees dealing with flight fees.

Penner, senior in aeronautical technology-professional pilot, said he has been captain of the intramural softball team and a member of Alpha Eta Rho, an aviation flight fraternity.

Mitchem said students in Salina need to improve Salina and K-State pride.

"No one goes to any games, and we'd really like to improve on that," he said.

'Hoops for Coop' benefits son of K-State alumna

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first "Hoops for Coop" basketball tournament was Saturday at the Peters Recreation Complex.

The K-State Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils facilitated the event, which raised money for Cooper Rieg, a 2-year-old boy with Sanfilippo disease. Cooper is the son of a former K-State Pi Beta Phi sorority member.

According to his Web site, "Cooper is missing a crucial enzyme used to break down mucopolysaccharides, or sugar molecules, in the body. These unbroken down mucopolysaccharides build up in each and every cell in the body, causing progressive damage to his vital organs, primarily the brain, leading to mental retardation, physical debilitation and eventually death. The life expectancy of Cooper, untreated, is 10 to 15 years."

Cooper recently finished a long period of chemotherapy treatments and is undergoing experimental stem cell treatments, Peter Rieg, Cooper's father, said.

"The money (from the event) was raised entirely from T-shirt sales," said Jeff Markey, senior in psychology and IFC director of public relations.

"All proceeds will go directly to Cooper's family," Markey said.

Additionally, the semi-finalists from Saturday's tournament will play the final game during K-State's game against the University of Kansas on March 4 at Bramble Coliseum.

"When I first heard about Cooper's story, my heart broke," said Jessie Daniel, sophomore in business administration pre-professional and Panhellenic delegate for Pi Phi.

"With the financial burden being so large, I knew that I had to do something to help. So I thought of everything I could, and came up with 'Hoops for Coop.' It has also been amazing to see the greek community pull together to help out Cooper and his family."

Although participation in this year's event was limited to members of the greek community, Markey said he hopes to include the entire campus if the event occurs again.

"If anyone wishes to help out, (they) can send a check directly to Cooper's Troopers, a family-run foundation," Daniel said.

Erin Stump, senior in life science, participated in the event for Gamma Phi Beta sorority.

"It was a great experience," Stump said. "It was really good to see all the fraternities and sororities come out and support him."

The total amount of money raised has not been calculated yet.

Mailing information and additional information about Cooper and his condition can be found at www.caring-bridge.com/visit/cooperrieg.

For those looking for job opportunities or more information about careers in various fields, the annual K-State Criminology Career Fair is from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Tuesday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

Many employers will be available for students.

"As of last week, 22 to 24 employers were confirmed to attend the event," said Karl Kandt, assistant director of Career and Employment Services.

The fair was organized by members of the KSU Criminology Club, a club faculty-sponsored by Roy Barnett, instructor of sociology, anthropology and social work.

Barnett said he thinks the career fair has many benefits for students.

"There are a number of good reasons for students to attend the career fair," he said. "It provides students with a chance to acquire employment in the near future. Students can inquire with the agencies about possible internship opportunities."

Barnett also said students might be able to get a better idea of what different careers include.

"I believe that some students may not have a clear idea about their future careers," he said. "(They) can come to the fair and talk to professionals in various fields and possibly come away with a better understanding of what they would like to do after graduation."

Barnett received help organizing the fair from two active Criminology Club members, Christopher Berger, junior in sociology, and Lindsey Hicks, senior in education-social studies.

"I will be there from 7 (a.m.) to 3 (p.m.) making sure everything runs smoothly," Berger said. "I helped organize the career fair last year as well."

The Criminology Club has many other events and activities on campus in addition to the career fair, which is in its sixth year at K-State.

"The Criminology Club involves guest speakers in the criminology field as well as field trips," Berger said. "It helps build connections for future jobs."

The fair is open to all students of all majors at K-State.

"The event targets criminology and sociology/social services students, but is open to all students and many employers do request students from all major backgrounds," Barnett said. "(This) event involves students getting a chance to meet and discuss employment and internship opportunities with criminal justice and social service agencies."

Shooting a basket, Jay Farias, sophomore in mechanical engineering, participates in "Hoops for Coop," a three-on-three basketball tournament on Saturday. K-State's Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils put on the event.

Baylor holds off late Wildcat charge

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 10-ranked Baylor Bears might have picked up their first ever win at Bramlage Coliseum with a 79-70 victory over K-State on Saturday, but the Wildcats didn't make it easy for the defending national champions.

Facing its second Associated Press Top-10 opponent in four days, K-State (17-9, 7-8 Big 12 Conference) traded leads with Baylor (21-5, 11-4) 16 times before the Bears went 11-of-12 from the free-throw line in the final minute to seal the win.

"We haven't proven we have the ability to beat a team with an All American or a team that is a top 10 team, but we competed extremely hard," Coach Deb Patterson said.

After erasing a nine-point deficit in the first half to pull to within two, 37-35, at the break, the Wildcats would build a four-point lead with 13:08 left in the game before All-American Sophia Young led the Bears on a 18-5 run to pull ahead 64-53 with 5:22 remaining.

During the run, Young scored 12 of her game-high 33 points.

"Her performance (Saturday) was exactly what they needed to be able beat us," Patterson said. "She really brought it. She was virtually impossible for us to stop. We brought two at her a good portion of the game, and we brought extra attention to her."

Patterson said the combination of Young and the Wildcats' cold second-half shooting was the difference.

"I think we struggled because players that we rely on to make shots didn't make shots, and that's going to happen some nights," said Patterson, who is 7-24 in her career against top 10-ranked teams.

Although Baylor built a 12-point lead, 68-56, with 2:49 left in the game, the Wildcats were not done.

Sophomore Kimberly Dietz helped cut the lead to four, with back-to-back 3-pointers with less than a minute to play, but K-State was forced to foul and Baylor stopped the rally with its free-throw shooting.

"We knew they were going to try and foul us every time we got the ball and I think we did a pretty good job of making our free throws, and that's what really kept us in the game," said Young, who was 13-of-14 from the free-throw line in the game.

K-State was led by juniors Twiggy McIntyre who scored 20 points on 6-of-13 shooting and Claire Coggins, who finished with 10 points.

The Wildcats dropped their fourth conference game in a row and fell below .500 in conference play, but Coggins said K-State isn't throwing in the proverbial towel just yet.

"You can't just beat yourself with a defeat," Coggins said. "Losses come, but it's more important to get back on the court and not get defeated."

Men's golf team to play in Wexford

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's golf team is ranked ahead of 13 of the other 14 teams participating today and Tuesday in the Wexford Intercollegiate, according to the Golfweek/Sagarin men's collegiate golf rankings.

The Wildcats rank 81st in the country, and freshman Joe Kinney said Coach Tim Norris made sure the team members knew exactly where they stand. Players will use this ranking as motivation for the rest of the season.

"Coach sat us down after one of the practices last week," Kinney said. "He told us where we stand in the rankings, and he wanted us to come up with a goal that is reachable by the end of the season."

Kinney said the players decided they could do better than 81st place, so their goal is to come in 44th by the end of the season.

In this tournament the Wildcats will compete against six teams they already have faced this season.

They own a 9-0-1 record against these six.

Kinney said he enjoys knowing his team is ranked higher and has already played well against most of the teams in this tournament. However, he said he does not want to be too confident because it might adversely affect his game.

"I want to look at this tournament as if we are playing the 14 best teams in the country," Kinney said. "It's nice to be ranked higher than almost everybody, but we have to stay focused on just playing our best golf so we can win the tournament."

Norris said he likes the rankings because they quantify and rates his team's progress.

"The ranking is something in black and white that can be used to compare yourself against other teams in the country," Norris said. "I would hope the guys feed off knowing they are statistically one of the better teams in this tournament, but at the same knowing stats don't win tournaments, and we still have to come out and play solid golf."

Francis Marion University will be host to the inaugural Wexford Intercollegiate at the Wexford Plantation Golf Club, a par-72, 6,875-yard course is on Hilton Head Island, S.C., and is home to the PGA's MCI Heritage Classic in March.

In a new lineup, Kinney, seniors Ben Kern and Tyler Cummins, junior Jay Kramer and freshman Robert Streb will play the course for the Wildcats.

Kern sat out K-State's last tournament, the Matlock Collegiate, and he said he is excited to be back, especially with this mix of senior leaders and talented younger players.

"I am eager to get back out in that kind of tournament atmosphere," Kern said. "We have a great combination of players this week, and this tournament should be exciting, especially with the young guys playing so well."

Grad student helps with induction of Negro League Hall of Famers

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is a story of hope, of overcoming opposition and of proving one's worth. It is a story that began nearly 90 years ago in Kansas City, Mo., on run-down baseball fields around 17th Street and Brooklyn Avenue, where the Kansas City Monarchs used to play.

It is the story of Negro Leagues Baseball, initiated by Andrew "Rube" Foster, who organized the first successful Negro League team — the Monarchs — on Feb. 13, 1920.

It is the story of players like Willard "Home Run" Brown, Chester "Chet" Brewer and Clarence "Fats" Jenkins who played in the Negro Leagues decades ago, yet never received recognition for their contributions to the game and the social barriers they helped to break.

Now, 90 years later, it is the story of honoring not only those involved in the Negro Leagues, but also black baseball players before the league existed who were instrumental in paving the way for black athletes and laying the foundation to end segregation.

"The baseball players were really the first to dip their toes in the water of integration," said Ray Doswell, graduate student in educational administration and leadership. "It's an example of a great institution that African Americans were able to build and sustain, in spite of racism and depression, and because of its success, it helped to open doors and change America."

Doswell, a student in the Negro League scholars program, is part of the history that will be created this weekend in Florida when a 12-member committee meets to select the third — and probably final — round of Negro League players, managers and executives, to be inducted into

K-State men suffer 1-point loss to Oklahoma

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Forward Dramane Diarra and guard David Hoskins probably had a bad taste in their mouths after K-State's 71-70 loss Saturday at No. 22 Oklahoma.

Both players had a chance to send Sooners fans home disappointed, but neither could convert on potential game-winning shots.

Hoskins misfired on a 15-foot jump shot with about five seconds remaining and Oklahoma leading by one point, and the ball fell into Diarra's hands on the right block.

Diarra, defended by Oklahoma's Kevin Bookout, missed a right-handed put-back just before the buzzer sounded.

Coach Jim Wooldridge said Diarra was fouled on the play, but the foul wasn't called.

"He got fouled right there, and the ball came out of his hand," Wooldridge said. "I thought (K-State) deserved to win the game or at least have an opportunity at the free-throw line with no time on the clock to see if they could win the ballgame."

The game was close throughout, but after 16 lead changes, K-State began to pull away with 8 minutes left.

Not so fast. Trailing by seven points,

Oklahoma pieced together a 9-2 run to tie the game at 65 with 5:03 remaining.

Later, with 1:44 to go, junior forward Cartier Martin hit a 5-foot jumper that gave K-State a 70-69 lead, which ended up being K-State's last points of the game.

On the ensuing possession, Gray made what proved to be the game-winning shot. Gray led the Sooners with 23 points, while Martin paced the Cats by shooting 10-of-14 from the field for a game-high 26 points.

K-State (14-11, 5-9) has now dropped two consecutive games against ranked opponents by a combined two points. In addition, the Wildcats have lost nine games this season by five points or fewer — the most by that margin in school history.

"It's depressing," Martin said. "We just can't seem to get over the hump. It hurts to lose a close one like that, having an opportunity in the lane on the road. You get frustrated."

Inhale deeply, exhale deeply. Focus on one spot on the ceiling. This is your spot, and no one can take it from you.

Slow soft music plays in the background that helps to soothe and relax your body.

Let every fiber in your eyes relax, Dale K, comedian hypnotist, said to volunteers at the Union Program Council's AfterHours program Friday night.

This was Dale K's first time at K-State, said Sarah Morton, junior in accounting and UPC AfterHours co-chair.

"We are hoping for a couple of hundred people," Morton said prior to the show.

However, students filled almost every seat in the K-State Student Union Forum Hall and laughed at their peers who were under hypnosis.

"He is definitely not what you think of when you think of a regular hypnotist. He puts a fun twist on it," said Jacob Shaw, sophomore in pre-journalism and mass communications and UPC AfterHours co-chair.

The show began with thumping techno music and Dale K's high energy antics.

He told the audience that any volunteers on stage would appear to be asleep, but they really were not.

Dale K said one effect of hypnosis on the body is when a person sleeps the night after hypnosis, the body feels like it has received eight extra hours of sleep.

Dale K picked volunteers from the audience to be hypnotized.

He started with some simple directions for the volunteers. Dale K hypnotized the first set of volunteers to believe they had a bucket of sand in one hand and a string of helium-filled balloons attached to the other.

The volunteers had one hand as high in the air as they could and the other hand as close as possible to the floor.

The show relied on audience participation because the louder the audience clapped, the further under hypnosis the volunteers became.

In one part of the show Dale K told volunteers to pretend they were watching a movie that turned into a pornography with someone they knew in it. He then asked each volunteer who they saw.

"Man, it's my mom," Ben Stockebrand, senior in agribusiness, said.

Stockebrand was in the spotlight most of the show, seemingly the volunteer most affected by hypnosis.

Stockebrand played a key part in the exotic strip tease

Todd Zeller, junior in economics, experienced.

"It was a little awkward. When I first got on stage I didn't know what was going on. Then when he brought out the feather boas, I knew exactly what was happening," Zeller said.

At the end of the show, Dale K told the audience the volunteers would not remember anything until they reached the exit sign. He called it temporary memory misplacement.

After the show, Dale K took Stockebrand beyond the exit sign and brought him out of hypnosis.

Stockebrand said he could remember everything at that point.

"The most disgusting part was giving that guy a lap dance," Stockebrand said. "The funniest part was when I told the whole crowd that he was a fraud."

Sex Pistols flip off Rock, Roll Hall of Fame

Never mind the Rock Hall, there go the Sex Pistols.

Britain's most infamous punk rabble rousers are giving the big middle finger to the music industry types who have tapped the band for enshrinement in the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, issuing a grammatically impaired open letter saying they have no intention of attending the induction ceremony scheduled for Mar. 13 at New York's Waldorf Astoria Hotel.

"Next to the Sex Pistols, rock and roll and that hall of fame is a piss stain. Your museum. Urine in wine. We're not coming," the band says via a handwritten note posted on frontman Johnny Rotten's Web site, thefilthandthefury.co.uk. "Were [sic] not your monkey and so what? Fame at $25,000 if we paid for a table, or $15,000 to squeak up in the gallery, goes to a non-profit organization [sic] selling us a load of old famous."

The Sex Pistols, who had been passed over by voters for several years before making the list, had been expected to inject a little anarchy into the proceedings as one of five acts being inducted. Black Sabbath, Blondie, Lynyrd Skynyrd and the late Miles Davis will also be feted.

THIS WEEK... A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1964: Leaning tower needs assistance

On February 27, 1964, the Italian government announces that it is accepting suggestions on how to save the renowned Leaning Tower of Pisa from collapse. The top of the 180-foot tower was hanging 17 feet south of the base, and studies showed that the tilt was increasing by a fraction every year.

Proposals to save the Leaning Tower arrived in Pisa, but it was not until 1999 that successful restorative work began.

TUESDAY Public Sleeping Day

Public Sleeping Day is an opportunity to sleep in public. We can think of a whole lot of places to sleep in the public eye. And, today is the day to do it.

You can sleep on a park bench. You can doze on a blanket on the beach. Some people may opt to sleep on the job. They do so at their own risk. Have you ever caught twenty winks on a bus or subway traveling to or from work? Sure, we all have.

Wherever you choose to sleep today, we hope it is peaceful and restful.

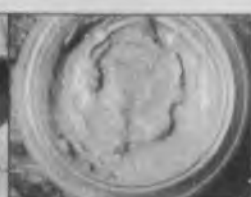

WEDNESDAY Combining 2 holidays

It just so happens that both National Pig Day and Peanut Butter Lover's Day falls on March 1st.

So in honor of this weird duo of holidays, here are our suggestions for celebrating today.

- Ride a pig while eating a peanut butter and jelly sandwich.
- Eat a BLTPB — a bacon, lettuce, tomato and peanut butter sandwich.
- Feed a pig some peanuts.
- Spread peanut butter on a pig.

THURSDAY 1836: Texas independence proclaimed

During the Texas Revolution, a convention of American Texans meets at Washington-on-the-Brazos and declares the independence of Texas from Mexico.

The delegates chose David Burnet as provisional president and confirmed Sam Houston as the commander in chief of all Texan forces. The Texans also adopted a constitution that protected the free practice of slavery, which had been prohibited by Mexican law.

FRIDAY 1991: Police brutality caught on videotape

A robbery parolee Rodney G. King stops his car after leading police on a nearly 8-mile pursuit through the streets of Los Angeles, Calif. A group of LAPD officers ordered King to exit the vehicle and lie flat on the ground. King was slow to respond. Officers tried to force King down, but he resisted, and the officers stepped back and shot King twice with an electric stun gun. At that moment, a civilian standing on a balcony in an apartment complex across the street caught all of it on his camera.

Activist speaks on K-State's partnership with Afghanistan

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Maryam Qudrat, activist and spokesperson in the Afghan-American and Muslim communities, spoke about Afghan women, education initiatives and Kabul University, at a presentation Friday.

"When I was in Washington, D.C., a young woman entered the room with positive ideas and energy, and I knew this special person was capable of influencing the world in many great ways," said Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology and dean of continuing education, in her introduction of Qudrat.

Qudrat is the author of the book "Torn Between Two Cultures - An Afghan-American Woman Speaks Out," which delves into the relationship between the United States and Afghanistan and efforts to bridge cultural divides.

Qudrat is a professor at California State University-Long Beach and is a graduate student in philosophy at the University of Southern California. She serves as the Women's Affairs and Social Institutions Officer at the Embassy of Afghanistan in Washington, D.C.

The afternoon's talk began with Qudrat's description of K-State's initiative in partnering with Kabul University.

"This is the first time a collection of colleges and deans are coming together in a leadership team to identify special projects to lift hearts and minds in Afghanistan," she said.

This initiative goes back a year, when Yar Ebadi, dean of the College of Business Administration, went to his home country of Afghanistan, after about 24 years.

"Post-Taliban, I saw immense potential in partnering with universities in Afghanistan," said Ebadi, who visited Washington, D.C. to get grants to support the academic initiative between K-State and Kabul University.

Commenting on the importance of the initiative, Qudrat said the project brought together people from opposite ends of the world and from various colleges within the university.

"With education you can automatically dissipate social plagues like terrorism," Qudrat said, referring to the 79-percent illiteracy rate in Afghanistan.

She said despite the lack of infrastructure in schools, Afghans have the will to learn, and they know the importance of education.

Charlotte Shoup Olsen, associate professor of family studies and human services, said it was encouraging to have a cooperative framework with the eagerness of the governments to facilitate such initiatives.

"K-State can spread its wings and offer its expertise," she said. "In turn, we can learn about other people and get a greater understanding of their lives."

The first leg of the project begins in April, when nine K-State faculty members will visit Kabul. Chris Ross, professor in the department of anatomy and physiology, is among the nine.

"Most of the faculty have only bachelors degrees and their system of instruction is mostly by rote," Ross said. "We are trying to make their faculty more competent."

Auditions for play based off popular comic strip begin today at MAC

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A popular Broadway show, "You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown," is preparing for rehearsals at the Manhattan Arts Center, 1520 Poyntz Ave., and auditions begin this week.

"Auditioners should be expected to do cold reading from the script in different parts," director Tyler Woods said.

"We have a lot of monologues picked out from the show and are looking for as much versatility as possible."

Woods said innovative actors will be cast, a revival version of the original show. The original production premiered in the 1960s, and a revival show was introduced in 1999.

"This show asks for fun from its actors," he said. "Actors that can think outside of the box and be more childlike."

Those who are cast will do a read-through and touch on the music prior to spring break and rehearsals will start after the break. Most rehearsals will be Monday through Thursday evenings with a few Friday and Saturday night rehearsals.

The musical is based on the "Peanuts" comic strip.

"It's a retelling of the comic strip," Woods said. "It takes characters from the page and puts them into living, breathing situations."

Included in the scenes, Wood said, are things recognizable from the comic strip.

"Snoopy does the Red Baron act," he said. "There's Lucy hitting on Schroeder while he's playing the piano and Linus with his blanket and Charlie Brown, trying to do the best he can."

Penny Senften, director of the arts center, said families should attend the show.

"It's a fun show and family-oriented," she said. "Musicals are always fun and bring in a good audience."

Producer Miriam Climenhaga said besides actors, there are other needs for the show.

"We need people to fill various technical positions," she said. "We need people to help

Haruf, 'Plainsong' earn praise

Author relates Manhattan community to childhood

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Author Kent Haruf read aloud a chapter from his book "Plainsong" at Manhattan Public Library Sunday afternoon.

The event was the first of the One Book, One Community program at Manhattan Public Library.

Haruf told the audience about his life as a boy in the high plains of Colorado.

"I have an intense and religious feeling about the plains," said Haruf, who watched the sun rise at Konza Prairie Research Natural Area on Sunday morning.

Haruf said everyone was familiar in small communities such as Manhattan, which is similar to the plains in Colorado where he grew up.

He said it is important for fiction writers to embrace intricate details in their writing.

"My goal is to write accurately about small towns such that the specificity of a place become universal and any one place becomes representative of all small towns," he said.

Born to parents who were avid readers, books played a significant role in shaping Haruf's life.

"I was inspired by Hemingway and Faulkner, and to this day I read them every day," he said.

Haruf said he was part of the Peace Corps in Turkey, and he said the people were warm-hearted and generous.

"We should try in this country not to make generalizations about all Muslims," he said.

Haruf said he has taught at high schools and colleges throughout his professional career and has juggled writing fiction.

Haruf's novel "Plainsong" was received with appreciation and public uproar in school districts in Minnesota, he said.

"I had been a writer for 30 years, and 'Plainsong' made me an overnight celebrity," Haruf said.

Commenting on his realistic style of leaving stories open-ended, Haruf said, "life doesn't end in neat and tidy ways."

Marcia Allen, collection development and processing manager at Manhattan Public Library, said "Plainsong" appealed to a large segment of the audience.

"This is a book which all the audience members could relate to," Allen said. "I was thrilled by the turnout for the event, and such an event brings people with the passion for books together."

Mary Beth Hauer, Manhattan resident said she enjoyed Haruf's book and reading.

"It was great to listen to the author talk one-on-one," Hauer said. "I love how the lives of the characters are extremely different but connected."

Mary Newkirk, organizer and committee chair of One Book, One Community, said she was delighted with Haruf's visit.

"We have received great feedback for this initiative," Newkirk said. "We hope to have more such interactions and discussions."

Emphasizing the importance of reading, Haruf said it takes a person into the lives of others making them more empathetic.

"Nobody can run for president if they haven't read sufficient fiction," Haruf said.

DOSWELL | Goal is education for young adults

National Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, N.Y.

"It's an honor and a great distinction to be asked, and I hope I can serve well," Doswell said. "This means a lot to a lot of people that these people who were involved with the Negro Leagues, who have been overlooked for a number of years."

Doswell, who lives in Kansas City, Mo., has worked as an educator and curator at the Negro Baseball Leagues Museum in Kansas City, Mo., since 1995, and it is because of his knowledge of the Negro League that he was invited to serve on the 12-person panel.

This weekend, the committee will choose from 39 candidates, including 30 from the Leagues — a time that spanned from 1920-60 — and nine candidates who were pre-Negro League (1860-1920).

It was never his intention to become an expert in Negro League baseball, but upon working at the museum and studying African-American history, Doswell said he feels he is qualified for the job. Still, he said he understands the responsibility.

"We're allowed a great deal of objectivity in deciding (who gets in)," Doswell said.

"But because of segregation, we're not privy to the same information as white baseball players, so it's more challenging."

Buck O'Neil has attracted the most attention nationwide of the 39 potential inductees and is a favorite to be inducted for two reasons: He is one of two nominees still living and he resides in the Kansas City area, serving as somewhat of a spokesperson for the Negro Leagues Museum, Doswell said.

"He is an effervescent, caring person and a dynamo of energy for his age," Doswell said of 94-year-old O'Neil. "It's always interesting to talk to people who've been there and seen it and done it."

O'Neil played for the Memphis Red Sox in 1937 before joining the Kansas City Monarchs and leading them to the Negro American league title in 1942. He managed the Monarchs until 1955. He became the first black coach in Major League Baseball when the Chicago Cubs hired him in 1962.

However, O'Neil is not caught up in his own acknowledgment. It is equally rewarding for him to see his former teammates and others in the Negro Leagues appreciated. It won't change the way O'Neil remembers his days in the Negro Leagues, Doswell said.

"He cares about the history and the other ball players and that they be recognized as well," Doswell said. "He's not going to change whether he's in or out."

Doswell said he is privileged to be part of the voting process, but there is another aspect of the Negro Leagues in which he has vested interest.

To Doswell, the Negro Baseball Leagues are rooted in more than just baseball. The history of the league is valuable to everyone, especially students, in areas like social studies, women's issues, politics, business and economics. This interest in helping educate children and young adults is what brought him to K-State, he said.

"There's not enough that's written in textbooks," Doswell said. "A lot of people pigeon-hole it from just a sports history standpoint or race relations standpoint, but there's all kinds of different threads that can come out of this history."

It is the shared belief that Negro Leagues baseball is a treasure chest of information that attracted Jerry Bailey, professor of education and director of Negro Leagues scholar program at K-State, to the Negro Baseball Leagues Museum and Doswell, Bailey said.

The museum and history of the Negro Leagues first caught Bailey's attention about six years ago on a trip to a teachers' convention in Colorado. One administrator began talking about the Negro Leagues, and it sparked Bailey's interest. Bailey and his colleagues then spent more than a year discussing the partnership with the museum and soon became the first school to team with the museum.

K-State faculty and graduate students formed a class, the Negro League scholars, and began conversing with people and traveling to the museum to gain knowledge they will eventually incorporate in curriculum to teach at elementary, middle and high schools.

The Negro League scholars, in turn, have taken the information learned and worked on projects to benefit the museum, such as teachers' guides for field trips to the museum.

Shakespeare shown as comedy

By Yiyi Chen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The "Complete Works of William Shakespeare" performed Friday night, depicted three actors' attempt to interpret Shakespeare's 37 works in a two-hour performance.

The show, performed as comedy, incorporated actors' facetious play and cat fights, and all three men wore Chuck Taylor classic shoes and mismatched tights onstage.

They began with a mockery of the Web site, www.wikipedia.org when Bret Palmer, junior in theater, read a fictitious biography of Shakespeare that he pretended was from the Web site.

"Wikipedia.org is a Web site where everyone can have their say," Palmer said. "Google is still my first choice for reference."

The performance emphasized four of Shakespeare's most famous tragedies and compressed his 12 comedies into one play.

The show's climax came when the trio, led by Ray Cherenfant, sophomore in theater, did a rap version of "Othello."

"Ray is an interesting actor," Cecilia Anderson, sophomore in theater, said. "He is in my class. I observed him and other actors in other places, and they do very well."

One of the performance's defining characteristics was audience interaction. During each scene, the actors not only performed for the audience but also asked them to participate.

"Anytime the audience is engaged, it is a success. You can feel it," said George Stavropoulos, senior in theater and one of the actors.

Another feature was the actors' ability to deal with unanticipated events on stage. In one act, two actors' suspenders tangled together, but they successfully incorporated the accident into the play as a joke.

"We have to maintain a level of smoothness," Stavropoulos said. "Sometimes there are accidents on stage, and sometimes we will perform with the audiences. The key is to make everything look easy."

'Objects' gallery opens at MAC

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Still-life paintings and drawings are on display at the Manhattan Arts Center as part of its exhibition-sale titled "Objects: Common and Uncommon," which opened Saturday night.

The exhibition features five artists from Lawrence and the Kansas City area — Laura Carraker, Constance Ehrlich, Terri Juarez, Paula Hauser Leffel and Robert Zerwekh.

"The exhibition is traditional yet contemporary," said Ehrlich, who also is the show's curator.

Ehrlich said her charcoal sketches are meant to be witty and tongue-in-cheek.

"Characters like the Pillsbury doughboy and Mr. and Mrs. Potato Head are not human, but people can relate to them," she said.

Carole Chelz, show coordinator, said the paintings are painterly — the characteristic of having brush strokes visible on the canvas.

"You can see a lot of texture and colors," Chelz said. "The subject matter is very recognizable and familiar — like apples and a teapot and flowers."

Juarez said her styles involve more loosely painted still-life with visible brush strokes and more artistic license.

"My paintings are meant to instill comfort, peace and quiet because of their sheer familiarity," Juarez said. Zerwekh, professor of engineering management at the University of Kansas, has a collection paintings on display. His style, called "trompe l'oeil" or "to fool the eye," is a celebration of realism, he said.

"My paintings are meant to invoke a mysterious feeling," Zerwekh said. "I want people to enjoy the colors and feel the composition."

RODEO | Working with livestock taught bull rider to keep his cool

While he tries to stay on a bull for at least eight seconds, Base said the world slows down.

"When a bull's bucking, it's slow motion to me," he said.

Base's girlfriend, Ashley Brewer, said when she first started watching Base compete, she was nervous, but over time she has seen his talent shine.

"It's nerve-racking," Brewer said. "But he's so good, and he knows what he's doing. I love that he's so passionate about it."

Base said rodeo runs in his blood, as he started riding calves when he was about 5 years old. As a young man, Base said he helped his uncle train young bulls for competition.

"He made me sit there and get the crap kicked out of me," Base said with a laugh.

Base said working with his uncle and being around livestock taught him how to keep his cool in the worst predicaments. Base said he has been pinned by stock and flipped by more animals than he can count, but he has learned to keep his head.

While he loves the thrill of riding, Base said he knows a day will come when he will have to stop competing.

"You know it's coming in time," he said. "Everybody just faces the day it just hurts too bad every time."

Although winning means beating the opposition, Base said the main competition is the animal, not the other riders.

"It's competitive, but I'm not competing against these guys," he said. "I'm fighting the bull. It's something we all do together. I love helping these guys."

Derrick Rawson, sophomore in general agriculture, began bull riding with the rodeo team last fall but said he began after being persuaded by Base. Rawson said Base has provided encouragement and support.

"It's a lot different having a coach tell you what to do and having a guy that rides with you," Rawson said.

ROBERTS | Senator: United States needs to face terrorism head on

Kansas," Roberts said.

Roberts said he was most concerned about national security, and the media and war protesters are responsible for weakening the resolve to win the war on terrorism.

Roberts said the United States needs to present a unified image of resolve to the rest of the world, and the leaks of classified information to the media about domestic spying were detrimental to that effort.

"I am gravely concerned," Roberts said. "The leakers are deciding what is classified or not."

When President Bush authorized the tapping of phones of suspected terrorists, it was not domestic spying, Roberts said. The requirement that a president go through the Federal Intelligence Surveillance Court to get that authorization is a good idea but not practical.

"In a time of war and probable attack, FISA ties our hands," Roberts said.

The war on terrorism will not be over quickly, Roberts said. It is important that as a country the United States stay focused on defeating the terrorists who see us as dust, and hold no value to human life, he said.

"Our parents and grandparents did as much for us," Roberts said. "Our children and grandchildren certainly deserve the same."

RESIDENCY | Students can establish residency in a variety of ways

I had an associate's degree from Kansas, I had lived there three and a half years and I had a Kansas high school diploma."

Moffett did not meet the criteria, but students who move to Kansas to attend K-State can establish residency in several ways, Moeder said.

A student must reside in Kansas for a continuous 365-day period before the start of classes and demonstrate intent to establish ties to Kansas by working a full-time job, paying resident taxes, registering to vote, obtaining a Kansas driver's license and registering a vehicle in Kansas. The student cannot enroll in classes and cannot be supported by parents or claimed as a dependent in another state.

Cooper said students applying for residency must prove they are not in Kansas simply for educational purposes.

"The basic thing we're looking at is, what has the student been doing since they came to Kansas?" Susan Cooper, assistant registrar, said.

However, there are special circumstances, Moeder said.

If a student is stationed in Kansas on full-time active military duty or is a dependent of a person on full-time military duty, he or she can be granted a waiver to pay in-state tuition.

Also, if a student's parents move to Kansas because of a job or job recruitment, the student pays in-state tuition.

If a student's parents are divorced and one parent lives in Kansas, the student is also eligible for in-state status, according to the Office of Admissions' Web site.

Spouses' in-state statuses are determined separately, according to the Web site.

Moeder said students apply for admission to K-State and then their in- or out-of-state tuition status is determined. Continuing students file applications for residency with the Office of the Registrar.

Cooper said the office received 33 applications for residency in fall 2005 and approved eight of those. In spring 2006, the office received 19 applications and approved nine.

After receiving the ruling, students can appeal to the Residency Appeals Committee.

"Generally students coming from out of state are qualified as non-residents, and there's no question about it," Moeder said.

Moffett said she considered appealing her status.

"In my situation I think it was completely unfair," she said.

that don't spend a lot of money still win races, but that usually applies to general elections' candidates."

In last year's primary elections, Student Body President Michael Burns and Vice President Grant Groene spent $2,436.59. The runners-up, Tyson Moore and Matt Wagner, were the top spenders with $2,666.86.

Burns said there is some correlation between how much money candidates receive from students and how well a pair does in primaries.

Each student can donate a maximum of $20 to each presidential ticket.

"With expenses, there is not necessarily a correlation because it's about finding the best deals," Burns said.

Moore, who is the current Student Senate Chair, said campaign spending does and does not affect the results of elections.

"There is a certain level of spending that a campaign has to spend to get their message across," said Moore, who came in second in last year's presidential race. "But if you look back, the winning campaign hasn't necessarily been the campaign
